9. On the eve of the recent Congressional election Senator Lehman disclosed that he had requested, and had been granted, a Senate investigation into PASNY's arrangements for the distribution of power in New York State. Hearings are to be held by a subcommittee headed by Senator Langer, Republican of North Dakota, of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. This may foreshadow an attempt by the Democrats to cite Mr. Dewey's arrangements for distribution of St. Lawrence power as another Republican "giveaway" of natural resources. (Franklin Roosevelt Jr. has called it a ten times bigger giveaway than Dixon-Yates). The question of public versus private power played no small part in the recent election campaign and may well grow during the next two years. Since Mr. Harriman faces a solidly Republican legislature in Albany, there is likely to be considerable political bickering within New York State and nationally on St. Lawrence power, of which Senator Lehman's move would be the first step. Officials here assume that neither Democrats nor Republicans in Albany or Washington will wish to alter the present arrangements for the construction of the power works, no matter what may develop on the distribution side and the F.P.C. license relevant thereto.

Canal and Lock Dimensions

10. Last month Mr. Castle, President of the United States Seaway Corporation, held hearings in the Pentagon to enable shipping interests, port authorities, and maritime and defence agencies to express their views on the dimensions of the new seaway works. The consensus was heavily in favour of locks of considerably larger dimensions than those currently contemplated by the United States and Canadian authorities, which are equated to the Welland Canal system. Mr. Castle then requested his engineers to prepare estimates of the cost of constructing larger and deeper facilities at Barnhart and Iroquois. Danielian has since taken the line that Canada, instead of duplicating the facilities at Iroquois, might better spend its money on enlarging the Welland Canal and the new works to be constructed in the Canadian section of the St. Lawrence. Mr. Castle has been informed that Canada would not contemplate enlarging its facilities at this time, which would cost several hundreds of millions of dollars.

11. Last week Mr. Castle announced that the United States Corporation would stick to the original dimensions because "the Corporation is limited to the authorized expenditure of $105 millions" and because the original dimensions "are in conformity with the dimensions on the Welland Canal, and of prospective locks on the Canadian portion of the seaway, between Montreal and Massena".

Meetings Between the Two Seaway Authorities

12. Meetings are being held in Washington on November 23 between Messrs. Chevrier, Castle and their advisers. They will discuss tolls and dredging in a very preliminary way. We hope that, as a result of this meeting, we shall get some very useful information.

Article in "External Affairs"

13. An illustrated article on the St. Lawrence Project will appear in the November issue of the Departmental Bulletin. I hope that it will help correct a number of misapprehensions on this subject.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following for Paul Pelletier, Privy Council, from Chevrier, Begins: In the course of our meeting this morning the question of dredging operations came up for discussion. Mr. Castle referred to two incidents which occurred on the border near Cornwall where Mannix-Raymond have a contract from Hepco for certain coffer damming. He stated that a Canadian dredge was brought in against United States laws prohibiting the importation of foreign-built dredges, and where a tug crossed the border to do work on behalf of a contractor in violation of the United States coastwise regulations.

2. Both these cases had been dealt with by waivers of United States laws under the authority that this was for defence. Mr. Castle wanted to know if Canada would be willing to reciprocate. I indicated immediately that this was not a matter for the Seaway Authority to determine, but for the Government. However, I asked whether this was meant to apply to individual cases which came up along the border or to the broad question of dredging for power and navigation. Mr. Castle was not too clear at this stage, but said he rather thought it was in individual cases only.

3. Later on Mr. Castle brought to the meeting Mr. Lee of the State Department, who came to explain the legal position. Mr. Lee dealt at some length with the statutes of the United States prohibiting the importation of foreign equipment and said that unless there was some reciprocation on the part of Canada, the position would be a difficult one for them. Mr. Lee added that the St. Lawrence Development Corporation had initiated this request. I again asked whether it was the intention to deal with these cases individually as they arose or whether it was meant to seek reciprocation on behalf of Canada in the whole area extending from the Great Lakes down from Montreal. Mr. Lee then stated that all he was talking about was individual cases. Mr. Castle confirmed this and said that he had received numerous protests from shipping interests, labour unions and others against the use of Canadian dredges on American soil.

4. I gathered from the discussions, as did my colleagues of the Seaway Authority, that no attempt will be made to seek reciprocation on behalf of Canada for dredging operations generally, but that the request sought applies only to individual cases. My understanding is that when such cases arise, individual waivers will be requested. This, you will realize, is an entirely different problem from the one raised in our discussions. It would seem to me that there is no objection to dealing with the matter on this basis and is much preferable. I thought you should be advised of this at the earliest date so that you may pass this on to the Prime Minister, Mr. Marler, and Mr. Howe. The talks I had yesterday with the Prime Minister and Mr. Howe were based on the broad general basis of reciprocity for both power and navigation facilities. Ends.

DREDGING IN THE ST. LAWRENCE PROJECTS

As you know I have been a little concerned recently that the question of dredging in the St. Lawrence projects may cause some irritation between Canada and the United States. My main concern, briefly, is that there may be in Ottawa some unwarranted suspicion of United States motives on this question, as well as some more or less innocent misrepresentation of previous developments and particularly of Canada's part in those developments.

2. The question of dredging has attracted attention in Ottawa and Washington from time to time since we began to negotiate with the State Department for some type of agreement on customs and immigration arrangements to be applied in the construction of the coffer-dams to be built in conjunction with the St. Lawrence power project. Each country has legislation which prohibits the operation of a foreign-built dredge in its own waters, and some efforts were made during the coffer-dam negotiations to see whether or not these restrictive laws could be waived to permit the most efficient and economical allocation of the work. At the outset Canada took the initiative in seeking a waiver of the relevant United States laws on a reciprocal basis and members of the Embassy, in the early stages of the negotiation, left the United States Customs Bureau and State Department officials with that impression. That impression was strongly reinforced in the final stages of the negotiation when Ernest Côté explained the Canadian position on dredging in some detail to Hayden Raynor of the State Department.

3. Presumably as a result of those conversations, the State Department reviewed the United States position and told us, before the letters on the coffer-dams were exchanged, that there was a way in which the relevant United States laws could be waived. This was reported to Ottawa but we received no further word. When the letters finally were exchanged they were worded in such a way that vessels (i.e. dredges and pile drivers) were excluded from the waiver.

4. In the meantime, thinking in Ottawa on the waiving of customs duties had undergone some change, and the Canadian position seemed to be that no further customs concessions other than those for the power project coffer dams would be granted.

5. Just prior to Mr. Chevrier's recent visit to Washington we learned that the United States laws on dredging had been waived, presumably to expedite construction on the power project. You will recall that after his meeting with Mr. Castle, Mr. Chevrier reported to Ottawa that the United States authorities had inquired whether Canada would grant a reciprocal waiver. From Mr. Chevrier's message I would judge that he would probably favour a waiver that could be applied to individual cases as they arose, but probably would not favour the granting of a general waiver similar to that already existing on the United States side.

6. We have had no word from Ottawa yet on what the official Canadian reply to Mr. Castle's request is likely to be, but in the various papers sent to us for information we have noticed a number of references which lead us to believe that the tendency in Ottawa is to forget (a) that Canada initiated the request for a waiver, and (b) that we left the United States officials under the impression that we would have welcomed a waiver such as the United States now has put into effect. The end result may possibly be that in Ottawa the United States will be painted as the villain of the piece who granted the waiver for some ulterior motive, when, from our point of view at least, they have simply acted on the justifiable assumption that Canada wanted the waiver in the first place.

7. To conclude, it seems possible to me that if Canada does not reciprocate the United States action, the different positions of the two countries will almost certainly attract some attention in the press and some explanation may become necessary. If explanations are to be made it is essential, in my view, that all the facts in the case be presented fairly.

8. I am not suggesting that Canada should necessarily reciprocate the United States waiver. In fact, the present study of dredging being carried out in Ottawa might well indicate that it is in our own interest not to grant any kind of waiver. But if that is the eventual outcome Canada should at least be prepared to admit the part we played in earlier negotiations and to avoid misrepresenting the subsequent actions of the United States.

9. I should like you to know that this memorandum was prepared by Mr. Taylor.¹⁴⁸

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY; U.S. PROPOSAL TO INCREASE LOCK DIMENSIONS

As I told you at lunch today Mr. Chevrier called me on the telephone this morning to inform me that Mr. Castle, the Head of the U.S. St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, wanted to come to Ottawa shortly after the New Year to discuss with Mr. Chevrier and his engineers the desirability of increasing lock dimensions in the St. Lawrence Seaway by adding 2 feet to the depth (from 30' to 32' over the sills) and by adding approximately 50 feet to the length (to 891' from pintle to pintle).

You may recall that following some considerable speculation in the newspapers and elsewhere some time ago, the U.S. Corporation announced that the Welland canal specifications would be used throughout the piece. There apparently has been a change of heart again and they are now talking of lengthening and deepening the locks although there is no intention at this time to suggest widening them as the U.S. Corps of Engineers had suggested some time ago.

Mr. Chevrier suggested that we might ask our Embassy in Washington to try and find out informally from the State Department what is behind all this agitation. I think this is a good idea and the Department of External Affairs is accordingly getting in touch with the Embassy at Washington forthwith. At the same time Carl West will attempt, at the engineering level, to find out from General Robinson and company what is the essential motivation behind the suggestion.

Mr. Chevrier himself will be in Barbados for the first two weeks in January and his interview with Castle will therefore not take place until some time after the 17th.

I think this situation is (or might become) quite serious. The US (who are we know anxious to meet us where they can — they have proved this) go out of their way to grant our requests (advanced as a reciprocal solution). We have second thoughts for our own material reasons & remain silent. I think we should put this to the Minister — perhaps in a personal & confidential letter expressing our anxieties and enquiring. NATURAL GAS: F.P.C. OPINION NO. 271

The Minister has received a letter on the above-mentioned subject, dated June 28, from the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the text of which is quoted below. Your comments on Mr. Howe's letter would be appreciated. It would be useful if you could discuss the subject with Mr. N.R. Chappell (D.D.P. Washington) but you should not (repeat not) of course raise it in any way with United States officials. We have not yet been able to give any consideration to this matter and consequently are not able to let you have even preliminary views.

2. An acknowledgment of the letter will be sent immediately stating only that we are studying the questions Mr. Howe has raised and are seeking your advice. We would hope, however, to let Mr. Howe know very soon what action might appropriately be taken pursuant to his suggestions.

3. Text of the letter follows:

Ottawa, June 28, 1954

My dear Colleague:

No doubt your officers have considered Opinion No. 271 of the Federal Power Commission denying the application of Westcoast Transmission Company for permission to deliver gas into Washington and Oregon. In my judgment, this Opinion No. 271 contains implications that should be brought officially to the attention of the State Department.

The finding itself is found on page 9, as follows:

"... It is for these reasons and others, including the feasibility of the projects hereinafter discussed, that we conclude that the applications of Pacific and Colorado Interstate should be granted.

"Since the areas to be served by Pacific in the State of Washington and at Portland, Oregon, would be largely duplicated by Westcoast Inc. and Trans-Northwest, these applications are mutually exclusive and the applications of Westcoast Inc. and Trans-Northwest must be denied."

While the finding is disappointing in itself, it calls for no comment from me. However, the reasons given for the finding must be challenged. I quote from pages 24 and 25, as follows:

"Such protection would not be afforded to any segment of the American people if its sole source of essential natural gas were through importation from a foreign country without some intergovernmental agreement assuring the continued adequacy of its supply. Otherwise, all control over the production, allocation and transportation to our border of such natural gas would be in the hands of agencies of foreign governments, whose primary interest would of necessity always be in the needs and advantages of their own people, and whose judgments and actions would be essentially dependent upon public opinion within that country, rather than upon the interests of American consumers. Regardless of any long and cherished friendly relations with any neighbour nation able to supply such area with natural gas, it would not be in the public interest to permit the importation of its gas as the sole source for the consumers in need of an uninterruptible supply at a reasonable price, which should always be assured by this Commission to the full extent of its powers.

"In this Pacific Northwestern section of our country there are potential industrial consumers of natural gas whose needs will be great and who may well be supplied with imported gas on a supplementary or interruptible basis. In any area which is receiving from an American source a supply of gas sufficient for its firm needs, it is conceivable that there might be imported to it from a neighbour country upon satisfactory terms and conditions a supplementary supply of gas for its interruptible needs. We do not consider it to be in the public interest, however, to authorize a most important new project to serve a major area — involving a large and important segment of the American economy — which from the outset will be completely tied to and wholly dependent upon an exclusive source of supply entirely beyond the control of agencies of the United States."

These paragraphs imply that foreign relations are being handled by a commission of the United States Government, rather than by appropriately constituted U.S. authorities. The argument against importation from foreign sources indicates that the Federal Power Commission has placed an embargo against the importation of Canadian gas into the U.S. on any firm basis. This is in effect tantamount to a complete embargo, as it would be impossible for any company to finance a gas supply from Canada to the U.S. solely on an interruptible basis. Therefore, the F.P.C. has laid down a general ruling that the U.S. cannot import natural gas from Canada.

It is worth noting that in the "orders" section of the Opinion, letters (F) and (G), page 33, the Commission dismisses without prejudice the rival applications of Northwest Natural, Glacier, and Northern Natural, while at the same time denying the application of Northwest Transmission. Surely all applications based upon gas supply from Canada should have been denied or all of them dismissed without prejudice, to maintain legal consistency.

It is also worth noting that during the Korean build-up this Department received some pressure from the Director of Defence Mobilization to make Canadian gas available to the Pacific Northwest. In particular, the Department received a very urgent request from the Director of Defence Mobilization to export gas to supply the Anaconda smelter, in Montana, and the Government responded by arranging a permit for the required export and by helping to expedite the building of a connecting pipeline. This export certainly was not on an interruptible basis. Incidentally, we recently received an application, sent on by the province of Alberta, to increase this export substantially, which application I had intended to recommend but which, in light of the recent F.P.C. ruling, must be denied.

It may be well to remind the State Department that Canada has been exporting electrical energy to the U.S. under firm contracts for the past forty years and that these contracts have always been carried out, regardless of the fact that the power exported was from time to time urgently needed in Canada, particularly during two war periods. Our legislation governing the export of electrical energy is the same legislation that governs our export of natural gas.

I do not know of any incident associated with the export of energy from Canada which would justify the finding of the F.P.C. Therefore, I believe that the State Department should be informed of the situation. However, this is a matter for your judgment.¹⁴⁹

Yours sincerely,
C.D. HOWE

NATURAL GAS: FPC OPINION NO. 271

We agree with Mr. Howe that we should be instructed to draw officially to the attention of the State Department the passages he cites in the Federal Power Commission's opinion which provide some of the reasons for its denial of a licence to Westcoast Transmission. The various applications recently before the FPC for licences to supply the Pacific Northwest of the United States with natural gas involved such complicated issues, both of geology and of economics, that we do not think it would be appropriate for the Canadian Government to contest the decision of the FPC — which, in any case, must be regarded as a quasi-judicial body. However, we do think that it would be both proper and desirable to discuss with the State Department the practical meaning and the further implications of the passages quoted by Mr. Howe. Nor would there be any impropriety, in our view, in suggesting that these reasons, which are of a political rather than a technical nature, bulk so large in the opinion of the FPC that it must be assumed they carried great weight with the Commissioners when they were reaching their decision.

2. No doubt every government must give priority to what it believes to be the interests of its own citizens. The Canadian Government did so when it was developing the policy on natural gas that was enunciated by Mr. Howe last March.¹⁵⁰ The same principle was followed when the Canadian Government rejected the proposal of the Aluminum Company of America that some of the headwaters of the Yukon River in Canadian territory should be diverted to the Alaskan Panhandle in order to make possible a large hydroelectric development in the Taiya River Valley.¹⁵¹ But it is a far cry from that principle to the promulgation of an absolute doctrine that, in the absence of an intergovernmental agreement, facilities required by the people of one country should not be permitted to fall under the control of agencies of a foreign government as the FPC lays down in the case of natural gas required by the United States.

3. The meaning of that doctrine in practical terms, as Mr. Howe points out, is that it would be impossible for the United States to import natural gas from Canada. That should certainly be drawn to the attention of the State Department, we think, along with the consequences of applying that doctrine to the present arrangements for the flow of natural gas from Southern Alberta to the Anaconda Smelter in Montana.

4. Mr. Howe also suggests that the paras he quotes from the FPC's opinion imply that foreign relations are being handled by a commission of the United States Government, rather than by the appropriately constituted United States authorities. Although that possible implication might be lightly touched on in oral remarks to the State Department, we doubt whether it should be included in any more formal representations. The question of the scope of the jurisdiction of the FPC is a matter that is domestic to the United States; and we imagine that the Commissioners would argue that they were not exceeding their competence in basing their decision, in part, on the reasons which we find disturbing. In any case, that question opens up a highly debatable legal area on which we think it would be unwise for us to trespass.

5. However, we do think that there are further implications of the opinion that should be elucidated for the benefit of the State Department. In the recent St. Lawrence Seaway negotiations in Ottawa with the United States authorities, it was argued by the Canadian representatives that some guarantee would be required from the United States to ensure free right of passage for Canadian ships through canals in United States territory, subject only to the payment of tolls. The United States representatives, we understand, replied that it would be difficult for their government to give such a guarantee and suggested that Canada should rely on the good faith and good sense of the United States Government and people.¹⁵² We might point out to the State Department that, if the Canadian Government were to adopt the doctrine set forth in the FPC's opinion, it would categorically insist that, as the trustee for the transportation interests of the Canadian people, it could not, in the absence of an intergovernmental agreement, be a party to arrangements under which transportation facilities that are vital to Canada would fall under the sole control of an agency of a foreign government; and that, if the United States Government could not guarantee free right of passage, the Canadian Government would be obliged to reject cooperation from the United States and proceed without delay to build an all-Canadian seaway.

¹⁵¹ Voir/See Volume 17, Documents 841-843.

6. We think that an argument of this kind would not only be fair, but might be expected to produce a double effect. We are not so simple-minded as to imagine that it would produce a reversal overnight in the position of the FPC or of the United States negotiators on the St. Lawrence Seaway issue. However, we would expect it to have the effect

(a) Of inducing the administration, and particularly the White House to bring some private pressure to bear on the FPC by pointing out to them how awkward their doctrine might prove if applied by other governments in other situations; and

(b) Of suggesting to the United States negotiators on the St. Lawrence Seaway issue that they must come some way to meet our requirements that free right of passage for Canadian vessels through the United States canals be guaranteed by the United States Government. In other words, while not expecting to obtain full satisfaction on either score, we think that such an approach might shake the United States position at two points of importance to us and make their officials rather more malleable to our views. The effect in the field of natural gas might be to put the FPC Commissioners in a rather different frame of mind when they are hearing the appeal that is to be filed by Westcoast Transmission.

7. If you think there is merit in this suggestion, we think that our representations should be made to the Bureau of European Affairs in the State Department, which handles the St. Lawrence Seaway, rather than to the Bureau of Economic Affairs, which, although responsible for the State Department's interest in natural gas questions, has little authority in this field, according to our experience. In any case, we agree with Mr. Howe that we should be instructed to discuss with the State Department the passages in the FPC's opinion which he has cited.

NATURAL GAS: FPC OPINION NO. 271

We called yesterday at the State Department on Hayden Raynor, Director of the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs, to express the concern of the Canadian Government over some of the implications of opinion No. 271 of the Federal Power Commission. In order to emphasize the importance of the representations, we separated sharply the meeting at which they were made from our ordinary weekly consultations with Raynor, which also took place yesterday. Because of your instructions that the comments to be made on the opinion should be expressed in a "completely informal way", we hoped that it would not be necessary to leave any piece of paper at the State Department and we did not take one with us yesterday afternoon. However, as you will appreciate, these natural gas issues are not only complicated but fall somewhat outside the normal scope of the State Department's activity. When, therefore, we had completed our oral representations and Raynor indicated that he would be grateful to have something in writing on this subject, we thought we should try to oblige him. Our immediately following teletype contains the text of the informal unsigned memorandum which we are sending to Raynor this morning. The oral representations we made to him yesterday were virtually identical to what is set out in the memorandum.

2. Although Raynor offered a few personal comments on what we had said, which at least showed that some consideration had already been given to the FPC's opinion in the State Department, he was not in a position to make any official rejoinder to the views we had expressed. However, he indicated that the passages of the opinion which we had cited had also disturbed the State Department and had aroused interest and concern in the Office of Defense Mobilization. Raynor concluded by saying that when he had had an opportunity to study our memorandum, he would hope to be able to comment on it officially.

3. We wonder whether any thought has been given in Ottawa to the possibility of placing this whole subject of the export and import of natural gas by Canada and the United States on the agenda for the next meeting of the joint United States-Canadian Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs. It seems to us that this might be advisable, although, of course, no decision could be taken until we know when the next meeting is to be held and can gauge with greater accuracy what will be the status at that time of the various natural gas issues in which we are interested.

NATURAL GAS: FPC OPINION NO. 271

Following is the text of the memorandum being sent to the State Department this morning. Text begins:

The Canadian Ambassador has been instructed to draw to the attention of the State Department the following passage to be found on pp. 24-25 of opinion No. 271 of the Federal Power Commission, which was issued on June 18, 1954:

(At this point in the memorandum are included three paragraphs from the Federal Power Commission's opinion quoted by Mr. Howe in his letter to you of June 28. We also included the immediately preceding paragraph in order to make the excerpt self-explanatory.)

The Canadian Government is disturbed at what seem to be the implications contained in the last two paragraphs of this passage from the opinion of the Federal Power Commission. The argument against importation from foreign sources implies that the Commission has placed an embargo against importation of Canadian gas into the United States on any firm basis. This is, in effect, tantamount to a complete embargo, as it would be impossible for any company to finance the supply of natural gas from Canada to the United States solely on interruptible basis. Therefore it would seem that the Commission has laid down a general ruling that the United States cannot import natural gas from Canada.

In this connection, the Canadian Ambassador wishes to point out that, during the Korean build-up, the Canadian authorities were urged by the Director of Defence Mobilization in the United States to make Canadian gas available to the Pacific Northwest. In particular, a very urgent request was received from the Director of Defence Mobilization that gas should be exported from Canada to supply the Anaconda Smelter in Montana. The Canadian Government responded by arranging a permit for the required export and by helping to expedite the construction of the connecting pipeline. This export has certainly not been on an interruptible basis.

The Canadian Ambassador also wishes to remind the State Department that Canada has been exporting electric energy to the United States under firm contracts for the past forty years. These contracts have always been carried out regardless of the fact that the power exported was from time to time urgently needed in Canada, particularly during two war periods. The Canadian legislation governing the export from Canada of electrical energy is the same legislation as governs the export of natural gas from Canada.

Although not seeking at this time to contest in any way the findings of the Federal Power Commission contained in its opinion No. 271 which, it is realized, are based on many considerations of fact and law, the Canadian Ambassador wishes to point out that the action of the Commission in distinguishing between the applications of Northwest Natural Gas Company, Glacier Gas Company, and Northern Natural Gas Company, on the one hand, and the applications of Westcoast Transmission Company, Inc., and Trans-Northwest Gas Company, Inc., on the other, and dismissing without prejudice the three former applications (while at the same time denying the two latter applications) would hardly seem to be consistent with the principles enunciated in the passage from the Commission's opinion which has been quoted above.

Finally, the Canadian Ambassador wishes to suggest that, if other governments — and particularly the Canadian Government — were to adopt the doctrine set forth in the Federal Power Commission's opinion co-operation between governments in many fields would be impossible in the absence of binding governmental agreements. Text ends.

NATURAL GAS

For some time we have been coming to the conclusion that the time might be ripe for a discussion at a high level between the United States and Canada of exports and imports of natural gas across the border. The denial by the Federal Power Commission of the application of the West Coast Transmission Company to supply natural gas to the Pacific North West area of the United States and the informal representations that we felt obliged to make to the State Department concerning the original judgment by the Federal Power Commission in that case, illustrate the difficulties that may be expected to keep cropping up unless there is a better appreciation within the United States Government of Canadian policy in this field and unless it is more clearly realized on both sides of the border what can and cannot be done to facilitate the movement of natural gas.

2. As we understand it, the policy of the Canadian Government is that natural gas available in Canada should be reserved in the first instance for Canadian consumers but that supplementary quantities, including specifically those in the Peace River fields, may be exported to the United States. We gather that it is also reasonably clear that unless outlets can be arranged in the United States for some of the natural gas available in Canada, the national policy of the Canadian Government in this field may be considerably hampered. There would, therefore, seem to be advantage in making clear at the highest levels in the United States Government what the Canadian policy is and the cooperation that we would wish to obtain from the United States.

3. You will be aware that the entrepreneurs behind the West Coast Transmission Company have been showing some interest in the possibility of an inter-governmental agreement between the United States and Canada in the natural gas field to assure for a fixed period of years supplies from fields in Canada which, in the opinion of the Canadian authorities, might be used to meet United States requirements. This idea has also received some consideration within the State Department, as was made apparent in a letter of the 15 September from Mr. Outerbridge Horsey to Mr. C.D. Johnston, President of the United States Chamber of Commerce. We are by no means sure that such an inter-governmental agreement would be either necessary or desirable. But it must be assumed that that possibility would be raised on the United States side if there were a discussion between Canadian and United States ministers of natural gas problems.

4. We are not even sure that it would be desirable to try to formulate a set of principles or objectives in this area that could serve as guides for particular decisions. But at the very least we believe that there would be no harm and possibly considerable advantage in a thorough and realistic airing of the issues involved between ministers. Although it would be easy to over estimate the importance of the conclusions reached by the joint United States-Canadian Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs last March, we are inclined to think that the discussion which took place at that time has had considerable value subsequently in protecting Canadian interests from the worst excesses of protectionist pressures in this country.¹⁵³ A discussion of natural gas in that committee or in the Joint Industrial Mobilization Committee might be expected to have similar beneficial effects, we think.

5. It might, of course, be objected that such a discussion could hardly be expected to influence United States policy since responsibility for it lies largely in the hands of the Federal Power Commission, which is an independent and quasi-judicial body established by the Congress rather than by the President. Certainly that circumstance would limit the usefulness of any such inter-governmental discussion as we are suggesting. But it would be naive to think that the administration is powerless to influence the Federal Power Commission. If our wishes in this field were fully known and understood by the administration, we could have more hope that the FPC would take them into account in its judgments.

6. We realize that you and your colleagues must walk warily in this field. The pipeline builders resemble the railroad builders of an earlier age not only in the scale of their operations but in the amount of money they stand to gain. The shifting combinations between the various interests and the United States origin of much of the capital in these Canadian pipeline ventures are also as confusing as they were in the railroad era. All these considerations certainly dictate caution. Nevertheless, the fact remains that we have a national policy in this area which depends for its reasonably rapid implementation on some measure of United States cooperation. To explore at the highest level the degree of cooperation that we may expect to obtain would, therefore, seem to us to be the path of wisdom.

7. In the meantime, there is a related question which is both wider and more urgent. As you know, the President has established a committee on energy supplies and resources policy, which has been asked to report by the 1st of December. Should Canadian representations be made to that committee? That is a question which is examined in our immediately following telegram.

CABINET COMMITTEE ON ENERGY SUPPLIES AND RESOURCES POLICY

In your unnumbered despatch of August 25,[†] you requested whatever information we might be able to obtain about the Cabinet Committee on Energy Supplies and Resources Policy which has been asked by the President to report by the 1st of December, 1954. Such information as we have been able to collect is contained in this message. In addition, we thought that you might welcome some comment from us on the question of whether or not it might be useful for the Canadian Government to make representations to the new committee.

2. But first of all, for the genesis and work of the committee. We have been informed by the State Department that it grew out of an earlier unpublicized cabinet committee which was established to consider the problems of the coal industry in the United States. After this committee had been at work for some time, it came to the conclusion that it could not sensibly tackle the problems of the coal industry without broadening its scope to include consideration of competing forms of energy. It therefore recommended — and the President agreed — that a larger committee on energy problems should be established.

3. The new committee, which is composed of the Heads of the Departments of State, Defense, Justice, Interior, Commerce and Labour, and which sits under the Chairmanship of Dr. Arthur Flemming, Director of the Office of Defence Mobilization, has already held two meetings, we have learned from the State Department.

It has surveyed in a preliminary way the scope of the enquiry before it and has created a task force where much of the real work will be done. This is headed by Mr. Hames F. Brownlee, a New York banker who is a partner in J.H. Whitney and Company. The staff director of the task force is Mr. Joseph L. Fisher, who has been Associate Director of Resources for the Future, Inc. We have been told that Mr. Herbert Hoover, Jr., the new Under-Secretary of State, (who is a petroleum engineer by profession) has been showing great interest in the work of the committee and will ordinarily attend in place of Mr. Dulles.

4. Since the mandate of the committee includes petroleum and natural gas, we have wondered whether it might not be advisable for the Canadian Government to make representations to the committee in an effort to promote the rational use of North American supplies of petroleum and natural gas within the limits of the national policies of Canada and the United States. We have been informed by the State Department that the committee's task force already has found itself obliged to look beyond the territorial boundaries of the United States and take at least some cognizance of Canadian sources of supply. Mr. Fisher has also told the State Department it would be entirely appropriate for the Canadian Government to make representations to the committee, if it so desired.

5. On balance, we think that it might be in Canada's interest to submit a brief to the committee. This would provide an opportunity to make the case for exports of natural gas from Canada to the United States and to curb some of the more extreme nationalist views that have been rife within the Federal Power Commission. A Canadian brief might also draw attention to the two oil pipelines which now cross the United States border. The advantages of these pipelines to the United States, especially in an emergency, might be stressed and the attitudes which have given rise to the recent decision of the general services administration to apply the buy-American legislation to petroleum products might be combatted. Such representations might be of particular value at a moment when the protectionist campaign of a number of oil producers in the United States seems to be reaching a new peak. A brief of this kind would also presumably include some statistical information about Canada's resources of oil and natural gas.

6. In spite of the possible usefulness of such representations it must, however, be borne in mind that the core of the Cabinet Committee's mandate remains the problem of unemployment in the coal industry in this country. It should therefore perhaps be assumed that there may be more interest within the committee in what has been done by the Canadian Government to subsidize coal production in Canada than in Canadian efforts to export natural gas and petroleum to the United States. If it is decided to submit a Canadian brief, it should be prepared in such a way as to make allowance for that interest on the part of the committee even though nothing were said about the problems of coal mining in Canada.

7. In theory, comprehensive Canadian brief should also cover exports of electricity, diversion of waterpower and exports of stored water-power, as well as exports of petroleum and natural gas. We doubt, however, whether it would be either necessary or desirable to give anything but passing mention to these subjects in a Canadian brief if it is decided to submit one. The press release announcing the formation of the Cabinet committee made no mention of Hydro-Electric energy, although it referred specifically to coal, petroleum and natural gas. Moreover, so many water-power questions fall within the mandate of the International Joint Commission that it might perhaps be confusing to include them in a brief to the Cabinet committee. However, we imagine that those who might be charged with preparing a brief would want to keep at least in the back of their minds the following facts:

(a) The long-standing arrangements for the export of electric power from Canada to the United States at a number of points along the border and the new application for the export of power from the Kootenay River;

(b) The refusal of the Canadian Government to sanction the Taiya River project for the diversion of water-power to serve a proposed Alcoa plant in Alaska, and the encouragement given to the Frobisher interests to proceed with a roughly comparable scheme in the Yukon and Northern British Columbia;

(c) The continuing Canadian efforts within the International Joint Commission to establish the doctrine of downstream benefits for upstream storage; and

(d) The recent decision of the Government of British Columbia to provide Hydro-Electric power for the Kaiser Aluminum Company by agreeing to the storage of water in the Arrow Lakes.

8. The number of considerations that would have to be borne in mind in drafting a Canadian submission would thus seem to be extremely large. Notwithstanding that, we think that any brief it might be decided to submit might well omit any overt reference to water-power and Hydro-Electric issues and might focus instead on Canada's surplus resources of petroleum and natural gas and on the need to find logical outlets for them in the United States. In other words, before any representations are made to the new committee it seems to us that synoptic view should be taken in Ottawa of all the existing and proposed arrangements for the export of energy from Canada to the United States, so that our interests in any one sector would not be compromised by what we might say about another sector of this broad front. But such a wide-angled view of the problem as a whole would be for our own benefit merely and would not preclude us from singling out particular aspects for discussion from time to time with the United States authorities. The present moment would seem to be opportune for making a case to this new Cabinet Committee for the removal of the obstacles and uncertainties that now prevent the export of natural gas (and, to a lesser extent, of oil) from Canada to the United States in a rational way.

9. If it is decided to make any submission to the new Cabinet committee on energy supplies and resources policy, the submission should be ready, if possible, within the next fortnight.

DESPATCH X-1317

Ottawa, November 2, 1954

U.S. CABINET COMMITTEE ON ENERGY SUPPLIES AND RESOURCES POLICY

I have read your messages with considerable interest and have referred them to Mr. Howe and to senior officials in the Departments of Trade and Commerce and Northern Affairs and National Resources.

2. You have no doubt realized that if the Canadian Government were to submit a brief to the United States Cabinet Committee on Energy Supplies and Resources Policy, one problem that would arise is that any exposition of Canadian policy would have to reveal possibly as many exceptions to prevailing policy in each sector of the energy resources field as there are manifestations of the policy itself. Undoubtedly the preparation of such a brief would prove a useful exercise in itself, regardless of the advisability of submitting it officially to the United States Cabinet Committee at this time.

3. The Departments of Trade and Commerce and Northern Affairs and National Resources have, of course, the primary responsibility in this field. I have now received a letter from Mr. Howe, a copy of which is enclosed, in which he expressed the view, with which I agree, that this would not be an opportune time to discuss the question of export and import of natural gas with the United States, and that high level discussions in, say, the Joint Economic Committee would tend to delay decisions on pending applications for both the export and import of gas. Furthermore, he thinks that it would be unwise at this time to find ourselves involved, as we inevitably would be involved, in a discussion with the United States of the question of the storage of water in Canada for the generation of power in the United States, and of the complicated subject of down-stream benefits.

4. For these reasons, therefore, I would not be inclined to recommend that the particular suggestions put forward in WA-1817 and WA-1818 be implemented at this juncture. Your messages have, however, proved to be most useful in emphasizing the importance of developing a "synoptic view", which will doubtless serve us in good stead when a more propitious time arrives for discussions with the United States.

My dear Colleague,

RE — NATURAL GAS

I have in hand message addressed to yourself from our Ambassador at Washington, No. WA-1817, of October 19th.

My own feeling is that this is not an opportune time to discuss with the United States exports and imports of natural gas across the border. It seems to me that everything is reasonably in hand at the moment, and that high level discussions at this time would tend to delay applications both for export of gas from Canada and import of gas into Canada that we would like to see expedited.

It would seem to me that any discussion of gas would be bound to bring up the very contentious subject of use of Canadian waters to generate power in the United States, which is presently under study by the International Joint Commission and which will be the subject of legislation at the next session of Parliament.¹⁵⁴ I feel that we are not in a very sound position in this controversy and I think the chances of improving our position at a high level conference would be nil.

The time will come when it will be worth while to discuss these matters at a high level with the U.S., but it seems to me that the present is not an opportune time. Perhaps by next spring some of the matters presently in controversy will be resolved and at that time we might attempt to establish policy decisions. I would suggest that you advise our Ambassador accordingly.

Yours sincerely,
C.D. HOWE

COMMERCIAL CABLE COMPANY'S APPLICATION FOR PERMISSION TO LAND
A COAXIAL CABLE IN CANADA

Consideration of this application has now reached a stage in the Ad Hoc Interdepartmental Committee which warrants a further report to you following my memorandum of November 23,[†] particularly since the matter will certainly be raised soon in Cabinet by the Minister of Transport probably at next week's meeting.

On December 1 the Ad Hoc Committee had before it a Draft Memorandum to Cabinet[†] based on the discussions which had already taken place. We circulated a number of comments on this Draft most of which were accepted without much discussion. I attach for reference purposes copies of the minutes of this meeting[†] and of the memorandum for the Minister of Transport as approved.¹⁵⁵ We have not however seen the covering memorandum which the Ministry of Transport is preparing for submission to Cabinet.

We differed at the meeting with the Department of Transport on the procedure originally proposed. The memorandum which Transport had prepared contained, in addition to recommendations concerning the C.C.C. application, paragraphs setting forth the general outlines of a Canadian national policy for the telecommunications field. It seemed to us that an important policy of this kind should not be settled in such a relatively short time merely because a particular application had been received. However, the Department of Transport representatives felt that they had considered this and similar problems so frequently that it was not only possible but desirable to put forward the basis of general policy at the present time.

In the light of the changes made in the conclusions of the original Transport memorandum (which would have the effect of making these conclusions regarding future policies less rigid and nationalistic), and because the subject matter is so closely the concern of the Department of Transport, we did not feel justified in holding up the Committee's memorandum.

We also suggested that the submission should not be made to Cabinet until the views of the Chiefs of Staff had been obtained. We understand that Transport may proceed before these views are ready but this fact will certainly be noted in the memorandum to Cabinet.

I do not feel that this Department needs to put forward reservations concerning the revised conclusions reached by the interdepartmental committee. In general, the position is that the C.C.C. could be granted landing licenses for the cable, subject to certain technical stipulations, on the condition that the company undertakes not to terminate circuits in Canada except for:

- (i) defence communication requirements to points outside Canada in excess of presently available circuits and/or
- (ii) circuits for commercial uses leased to Canadian owned or controlled companies.

One important suggestion which we made and which it is hoped Cabinet will approve is covered by paragraph 18 of the memorandum for the Minister of Transport. It seemed desirable to protect ourselves against possible recriminations by the United States authorities suggesting that Canada had refused to grant permission for a cable necessary for the defence services of United States and of NATO. We proposed that the United States Embassy here be advised that if the United States Government wished to separate the defence aspects, and to submit a proposal for the landing of a cable by the United States Government to serve defence installations in Greenland, Iceland or the United Kingdom, such a proposal would be given the speedy consideration customary in defence matters between our two countries.

We have advised Mr. Robertson of these developments and he will shortly be discussing this question with the United Kingdom Postmaster General.

We also gave Earnscliffe a copy of the conclusions contained in the memorandum to the Minister of Transport in return for the information which Earnscliffe had previously provided on the reaction at the United Kingdom official level to the C.C.C. application. In doing so, we emphasized that these conclusions had not yet been approved by Ministers. In addition, during the Ad Hoc Committee meetings, we made it clear that we were participating without knowledge of your views and that you should be regarded as uncommitted.

Mr. MacLaren's law firm have already written the Minister of Transport concerning the C.C.C. application. The Commercial Cable Company will certainly not like the reservation contained in (ii) above if it is approved by Cabinet, and we will no doubt have further representations from Mr. MacLaren.

Have you any comments on these developments which you wish us to discuss with officials of other Departments?¹⁵⁶

EXTERNAL COMMUNICATIONS POLICY AND THE APPLICATION OF THE COMMERCIAL CABLE COMPANY

At its meeting this afternoon Cabinet will be asked to consider the attached memorandum of December 15 from the Minister of Transport. Supporting that document is a further and longer memorandum (copy also attached) dated December 3, containing the report of an Ad Hoc Interdepartmental Committee which has been considering the CCC's trans-Atlantic coaxial cable project. The Minister's memorandum is substantially the same as the Committee's one, and ends up with the same recommendations, in effect.

2. Mr. Pearson had an opportunity to examine the memorandum of December 3 before leaving for Paris, and he indicated that the proposed recommendations seemed to him to be satisfactory. I also attach the covering memorandum to the Minister, dated December 9. There is little that can usefully be added to that memorandum, except perhaps to elaborate the point in the fourth paragraph about the rigid and nationalistic slant of the original draft prepared in the Department of Transport. The reason we felt this should be softened was that we were concerned about the long-range implications to our relations with the United States in the field of commercial policy (e.g. in the case of natural gas) of pursuing too vigorously a narrow protectionist policy. However, we are satisfied with the present submission which leaves open the way (in paragraphs 6, 7 and 8) to making an offer to the United States Government, through their Embassy here, to consider speedily any separate proposal coming from them on the subject of their defence requirements alone. In this connection, if Cabinet approves Mr. Marler's recommendation (C), you may wish to have Cabinet confirm that this Department is to act in accordance with paragraph 18 of the memorandum of December 3 and advise the U.S. Embassy in the sense of the foregoing sentence.

RE EXTERNAL TELECOMMUNICATION POLICY

Application of Commercial Cable Company of New York

1. An application has been received from the Commercial Cable Company, New York, for permission to land in Canada a coaxial submarine cable between the United States, Canada, Greenland, Iceland and the United Kingdom. Of the stated number of 120 circuits, 20 would be reserved for the exclusive use of the U.S. Armed Forces in Greenland, Iceland and Europe, 24 would be terminated at Canso, N.S., and an unstated number would be terminated at Clarenville, Newfoundland.

The Company has statutory authority, granted 70 years ago, to carry out telecommunication operations in Canada, but under Section 22 of the Telegraph Act it needs a landing permit for the proposed cable.

2. As the application involves (a) possible defence needs of the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom and (b) the commercial aspirations of a U.S. telecommunications company, officials from the departments concerned have at my request studied this application in the light of government policy and have submitted to me a memorandum, of which a copy is attached hereto. Its principal points are summarized below.

Consideration of this application seems to make it desirable also to re-examine our legislation as to external telecommunications.

The Present State of Canada's External Communications

3. At present Canada's external communications are handled by Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation (a Crown company, usually called C.O.T.C.) and by Commercial Cable Company and Western Union, both U.S. companies. (The attached memorandum in paragraphs 6 to 10 inclusive gives the background of C.O.T.C. and a summary review of its place in Commonwealth communications.)

The business in Canada originated by Canadian National Telegraphs is handled by Western Union under an exclusive contract, while Canadian Pacific Telegraphs divide their business between Commercial Cable and C.O.T.C., both of which have business of their own. In consequence C.O.T.C. handles only about one-third of Canadian business while the remainder goes to these two U.S. companies.

As Commercial Cable are almost certain to acquire the external communications of Western Union, they will thus obtain control of about two-thirds of Canada's external message traffic.

4. C.O.T.C. under the terms of an Agreement made in 1953 (hereinafter referred to as the "1953 Agreement") is participating in the laying of a trans-Atlantic coaxial telephone cable with the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company, its Canadian subsidiary, and the British Post Office. This cable, involving an investment by C.O.T.C. of $4,500,000, will when completed provide telephone and telegraph facilities that are considered ample to meet Canada's needs for many years.

It is important to note that coaxial cables are capable of carrying about 2,000 times as many messages as the most modern of the existing trans-Atlantic cables.

The present investment of C.O.T.C. amounts to $4,257,162, and their present capital commitments amount to a further $9,563,101, making a total of $13,820,263.

The Commercial Aspirations: Dangers to Canadian Investment of the Commercial Cable Proposal

5.(a) The high rental to be paid by the U.S. Armed Forces for facilities to be leased by the Commercial Cable Company would constitute a substantial subsidy to them in competition with Canadian-owned carriers.

(b) In Newfoundland (where an unstated number of circuits in the proposed cable are to be terminated) telegraph service is now provided by Canadian National Telegraphs and telephone service by the C.O.T.C. and domestic telephone companies. These services now handle much of the military traffic between U.S. bases in Newfoundland and the United States. These Canadian companies have heavy capital commitments to provide ample facilities for foreseeable needs for Canadian and U.S. telegraph and telephone services.

(c) The proposal to terminate 24 circuits at Canso, N.S., would enable Commercial Cable Company to compete for all Canadian overseas telephone, telegraph, telex and facsimile services for which ample provision is now being made by C.O.T.C. to supplement their existing facilities. Commercial Cable, moreover, could lease some of their circuits to American Telephone and Telegraph Company which could use them for Canadian business and thus circumvent the restrictive clauses of the 1953 Agreement (Cf. Paragraph 4 supra) which were designed to preclude the use of U.S. circuits in the coaxial cable for Canadian business.

(d) Besides, even if Commercial Cable were given no traffic rights in Canada, it would be possible, because of the high capacity of the cable and the subsidy content of the rental to be paid for circuits in the proposed cable by the U.S. Armed Forces, for further serious effects to be felt by Canadian telecommunication companies. By using its existing facilities for telegraph traffic and for teletype services to and from Canada, Commercial Cable could provide service at low rates that could not be met on an economic basis by C.O.T.C.

Defence Needs

6. As will be observed from U.S. Government Note No. 89 of 18th November 1954† (of which a copy is attached to the officials' memorandum attached hereto), "the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff have concluded that there are important needs for this cable. The United States Department of Defense has concurred in this view. The Joint Chiefs of Staff consider the proposed cable a requirement for national defense and NATO". In this Note the U.S. Government expresses the hope that it may be possible to give favourable consideration to the application.

7. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff have been asked for an opinion as to the importance of the proposed cable from the standpoint of Canadian defense.

8. Service authorities in the United Kingdom, considering the matter solely on defense grounds, have been advised to support the application.

9. The attitude of the United Kingdom Government with regard to the matter is not yet known, but authorities at official level have given us their views which are embodied in a draft message, a copy of which will be found in Paragraph 17(a) of the memorandum attached hereto. The most significant phrase of that message follows:

"The U.K. Government regret that, in these circumstances, they cannot as at present advised see their way to permitting the projected cable to be used for purposes other than defense."

10. The Danish Government, I understand, appear to hold a similar view. (Cf. memorandum, Paragraph 17(b))

Existing Legislation

11. Under Section 22 of the Telegraphs Act, the Governor in Council may, for reasons relative to the public interest, refuse an application or attach conditions in approving a cable landing. This, however, is not a licensing system and there are such serious doubts as to the possibility of enforcing conditions as would justify amendment of the Act to provide for a more adequate licensing procedure.

12. As it is believed that the new facilities for Canadian traffic to be provided by C.O.T.C. by means of the Canadian circuits in the coaxial telephone cable to be laid under the 1953 Agreement will be entirely adequate for Canadian needs and as the agreement prevents the use of the other circuits in the cable to compete for Canadian business, it seems desirable that any new legislation should be designed (a) to facilitate the development of external communications by companies that are Canadian-owned and controlled, and (b) to avoid needless duplication of facilities and unreasonable competition.

[G.C. MARLER]

[PIÈCE JOINTE 1/ENCLOSURE 1]

Recommendations

I am in general agreement with the objectives and procedures proposed in the recommendations of the Ad Hoc Committee and accordingly recommend:

(a) that the Telegraphs Act be amended to provide for the licensing of external telecommunications not at present subject to the licensing requirements of the Radio Act, in a manner similar to that of the Radio Act;

(b) that among the objectives of the licensing system should be the progressive reduction, although not necessarily total elimination, of the operation of external telecommunications by other than Canadian owned and controlled companies, and so far as practicable the elimination of unnecessary duplication and unreasonable competition, taking into account the fact that Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation will have provided at public expense telephone and telegraph facilities between Canada and the United Kingdom that will be adequate for a number of years.

(c) that Commercial Cable Company be informed that the Government is prepared to grant to it a landing license for the proposed cable, subject to certain technical stipulations, on condition that the Company undertakes not to terminate circuits in Canada except for

(i) purposes of defence communications from Canada to points outside Canada, so far as circuits now available are insufficient, and

(ii) commercial purposes, but only in respect of circuits that are leased, with government approval, to Canadian owned and controlled telecommunication companies.

The nature and extent of defence communications permitted under (i) above would be defined specifically following further consideration of defence needs.¹⁵⁷

REPORT OF THE AD HOC COMMITTEE ON THE COMMERCIAL CABLE COMPANY'S TRANSATLANTIC CABLE PROJECT
(Proposed U.S.-Canada-Greenland-Iceland-U.K. Route)

An application has been received from the Commercial Cable Company, New York, supported by the U.S. Government through the Embassy in Ottawa, for landing rights in Canada for a coaxial submarine cable between the United States, Can-

¹⁵⁷ Le 16 décembre 1954, le Cabinet a accepté de modifier la Loi sur les télégraphes comme il avait été recommandé, mais a remis sa décision sur l'octroi d'un permis conditionnel à la Commercial Cable Company. En lieu et place, il a demandé un avis juridique :/

Cabinet agreed on December 16, 1954 to amend the Telegraphs Act as recommended, but deferred a decision on granting a conditional licence to the Commercial Cable Company. Instead, it asked for a legal opinion:

"regarding the extent of the legal rights enjoyed in Canada by Commercial Cable Company under its charter of 1884 . . . and as to the extent to which the government could refuse to grant Commercial Cable's application without such action amounting to a repudiation of rights previously granted to the Company by Parliament."

ada, Greenland, Iceland and the United Kingdom. Of the stated number of 120 circuits, of which 20 circuits would be reserved for the exclusive use of the U.S. Armed Forces in Greenland, Iceland and Europe, one fifth (24 circuits) would be terminated at Canso, N.S., and an unstated number would be terminated at Clarenville, Newfoundland (see footnote). The Commercial Cable Company has statutory authority under Canadian legislation enacted in 1884 to carry out telecommunications operations in Canada. Landing permits for the proposed cable, however, are necessary under Section 22 of the Telegraph Act.

Note: The effect of terminating cable circuits at any given point (e.g., Canso, N.S.), as opposed to merely bringing the lines ashore and carrying them overland for technical reasons, is to make it possible for any traffic to be transferred to or taken from the system at the terminal point. There is a distinction to be made between traffic of this kind and messages originating at some other point which are being carried through a landing point in transit only.

2. When privileges were first accorded the Commercial Cable Company in 1884, the telecommunications field was at a primitive stage of development and no one could foresee the technical changes which have since taken place. As a result of granting the company the legal rights which it enjoys under the existing charter, and as a result of major U.S. activity in the telecommunications field, American companies now control a major part of Canada's overseas telegraph traffic. The new proposal by the Commercial Cable Company, if approved, could result in a further increase in the already strong position of U.S. companies in the Canadian external telecommunications field.

3. This application involves two major issues, as follows:

(a) possible defence needs of the United States and of Canada and the United Kingdom.

(Attached to this document is a copy of Note No. 89 of November 18th, 1954, setting forth the importance which the U.S. attaches to the proposed cable in the light of comments made by the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff and the U.S. Department of Defense. The U.S. Chiefs of Staff consider the proposed cable to be an essential requirement for "national defence and NATO". The fact that the U.S. armed forces have offered a relatively high rental for the facilities to be leased from the Commercial Cable Company might be taken as evidence of the U.S. defence interest. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff have been asked for an opinion on the importance of the proposed cable from the standpoint of Canadian defence. Service authorities in the United Kingdom, considering the matter solely on defence grounds, have been advised to support the application).

(b) the commercial aspirations of a U.S. telecommunications company.

(It is not yet certain whether the U.S. authorities would be prepared to consider laying this cable solely for defence purposes. In the present application, considerable emphasis is placed on the necessity of securing commercial rights in order to justify the construction of the cable. While it is important that strategic requirements be satisfied, it is also important to ensure that, in so doing, the argument of strategic necessity is not used to win concessions for foreign commercial interests which would not otherwise be granted to them).

4. In November, 1953, Canada concurred in the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation's participation in the transatlantic telephone cable with the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company (a subsidiary of the former) and the British Post Office. This cable, when completed, will provide ample telephone and telegraph facilities for Canada for the foreseeable future. The project involves an investment of Canadian public funds amounting to $4,500,000, but the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, through their wholly owned subsidiary, the Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company, will have effective control of associated facilities in Canada.

5. Coaxial cables of the latest type represent a radical departure from previous cable techniques in that they are capable of carrying approximately 2,000 times as many messages per hour as the most modern existing transatlantic cable. It may truly be said that we are on the eve of a new era in transoceanic telecommunications, and the future should be viewed in that light. It has been suggested that in order to enable countries of the Atlantic community to secure the benefits of recent technical developments in telecommunications, and probably cheaper and more efficient services than now exist, the question of regulating communications developments might be considered in a NATO context, thus avoiding U.S. domination of the telecommunication field at Canadian expense.

Commitments

6. Previous to the war, the Commonwealth system of world wide telecommunications was largely controlled by Cable and Wireless Limited, a private British firm. In 1938, the Commonwealth Governments, having considered the strategic and other factors affecting the Commonwealth cable network, requested Cable and Wireless Limited to reduce intra-Commonwealth rates to a ceiling of thirty cents per full rate word — a substantial reduction — and in return agreed, inter alia, to use their best endeavours to stop circulation of traffic over foreign routes and to continue the policy of resisting the opening of new circuits which would be detrimental to Cable and Wireless Limited or its associates within the Commonwealth. In the explanatory notes relating to this agreement there is, however, a paragraph emphasizing that it was not attempting to impose any binding legal obligations which would be construed as limiting the sovereign rights of governments in their particular territories, particularly in the light of any radical changes in the circumstances under which the agreement was negotiated.

7. Notwithstanding these commitments, direct radio circuits were established during the war for emergency purposes, between the United States and Commonwealth countries other than Canada for the duration and for six months thereafter. At that time, it became clear that despite the serious financial repercussions to the Commonwealth, it was inexpedient in the face of United States pressures to insist upon closing these direct circuits.

8. A series of Commonwealth telegraph conferences held between 1942 and 1948 resulted in the "Commonwealth Telegraphs Agreement" signed by representatives of seven of the Commonwealth Governments on May 11, 1948 (United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, India, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia). Ceylon has since become a signatory. Under the provisions of this agreement, each Partner Government is committed:

(a) to acquire the Commonwealth external telecommunication assets operating within its territory;

(b) to nominate an existing Department or establish a public corporation to be known as "The National Body" for the purpose of acquiring, operating and maintaining such assets;

(c) to representation on a "Commonwealth Telecommunication Board" with headquarters in London, England;

(d) to negotiate financial arrangements based on the principle that maintenance and operation expenses of the "common-user" part of the system shall be borne by all National Bodies on an equitable basis.

9. In 1949, Parliament passed the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act which required this new Canadian corporation to acquire the external telecommunication assets in Canada of Cable and Wireless Limited and the Canadian Marconi Company (but not those of private American companies, viz: Western Union and Commercial Cable). The Act also requires, inter alia, the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation to coordinate Canada's external telecommunication services with the telecommunication services of other parts of the Commonwealth. Existing financial arrangements under the Commonwealth Agreement provide for pooling of costs incurred by all National Bodies for operating the Commonwealth network and for payment of such costs by National Bodies to be based on the ratio of their respective net revenues to the combined net revenues of all National Bodies from originating traffic. Thus each National Body has a direct interest in the financial well-being of the other members and in the success of the overall scheme, and it will be appreciated that the reasons underlying our low revenues are of concern to the other Partner Governments.

10. Canada is not contributing as much towards common user costs in relation to originating traffic as, for example, Australia which, with a lower total volume of originating traffic than Canada, contributes approximately three times as much as the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation. The reason is that the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation handles only about one-third of the external telegraph traffic originating in Canada because foreign companies are operating in this country. Canadian Pacific Telegraphs divides its overseas traffic between COTC and Commercial Cable, while Canadian National Telegraphs is tied to a monopoly arrangement with Western Union, another U.S. company, by long-term contract. Other Commonwealth national bodies control all originating traffic, except to a slightly lesser degree in the case of the United Kingdom where Western Union and Commercial Cable have certain pick-up and delivery concessions in a few centres which it is known the United Kingdom would like to terminate as soon as may be expedient. This situation weakens Canada's bargaining position at Commonwealth conferences when financial arrangements are under discussion.

Economic Features

11. There is every reason to believe that since Western Union have been ordered to divest themselves of their external communication facilities, such facilities will shortly be acquired by the Commercial Cable Company. The latter would thus inherit Western Union's exclusive contract with Canadian National Telegraphs and this, added to their own operating agreement with Canadian Pacific Telegraphs, would automatically give them control of about 66% of Canadian external message traffic.

12. The capital investment to date by the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, the only Canadian organization in the Canadian overseas telecommunication business is $4,257,162, and their present estimated capital commitments, including participation in the transatlantic telephone cable, amounts to $9,563,101, making a total of $13,820,263.

Dangers to Canadian Investment

13.(a) The high rental which the U.S. Armed Forces are prepared to pay for the facilities to be leased from the Commercial Cable Company would constitute a substantial subsidy to the U.S. carrier in competition with Canadian owned carriers.

(b) Termination of circuits in Newfoundland. The operation of the Commercial Cable Company cable as proposed from its landing point in Newfoundland would create subsidized competition from the American carrier in telephone and telegraph services within Canada and between Canada and the U.S.A. Telegraph service is at present being provided by Canadian National Telegraphs and telephone service by the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation and domestic telephone companies, including much of the military traffic between U.S. bases in Newfoundland and the U.S. These Canadian companies have committed and are committing themselves to heavy capital investments to provide ample facilities for all foreseeable needs for Canadian and U.S. telegraph and telephone services. The use of 24 circuits in Nova Scotia from the proposed Commercial Cable Company landing site would create subsidized competition in all Canadian overseas telephone, telegraph, telex and facsimile services for which, as indicated, ample provision is currently being made by the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation in addition to the facilities they already own.

(c) Termination of 24 circuits in Nova Scotia. The Commercial Cable Company proposal for new outlets at Canso, Nova Scotia, and Clarenville, Newfoundland, appears, therefore, to be unnecessary, with the exception of the U.S. military circuits and possibly one commercial circuit between Newfoundland, Greenland and Iceland. The use of the proposed new facilities by the Commercial Cable Company could have disastrous effects on Canadian investment and on Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation plans for developing Canadian-owned overseas communications. In addition, even if the Commercial Cable Company was not given any traffic rights in Canada, it would still be possible, because of the extensive capacity of the cable and by reason of its subsidy by the U.S. authorities, for further serious indirect effects to be felt by Canadian telecommunications companies. By use of all its other existing transatlantic facilities for the handling of telegraph traffic and customer-to-customer teletype services to and from Canada at low rates, which it could do if it had the new cable, Commercial Cable Company could provide service through their existing facilities which could not be met on a sound economic basis by the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation.

(d) Circumvention of the terms of the Transatlantic Telephone Cable Agreement of November 1953. The American Telephone and Telegraph Company could obtain telephone circuits in the proposed cable which obviously could be used for Canadian business, and they could thereby evade the restrictive clauses of last year's Agreement, which were designed to protect Canada's investment in that project by precluding the use of any of the American owned circuits for Canadian business.

(e) An established American communication company permitted to handle Canadian business in a cable which could, even without it, be economically operated, as would be the case in this instance, would have a tremendous financial advantage over the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation which has its operations confined to about 34% of Canadian traffic.

14. While there is technical provision in U.S. legislation and executive regulations for permitting a foreign owned organization to land a cable in the United States, it would appear that, under present circumstances, the chances of such an application being approved by the U.S. government are remote.

15. Under Section 22 of the Telegraphs Act, the Governor-in-Council may, for reasons relating to the public interest, refuse an application or attach conditions in approving a cable landing. This, however, is not a licensing system and there are such serious doubts as to the possibility of enforcing conditions as would justify amendment of the Act to provide for a proper licensing procedure.

16. In concluding the Transatlantic Telephone Cable Agreement in 1953 (described in para. 4 above), a position was taken whereby the activities in Canada of Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company — also American owned — were restricted to the handling of U.S.A. transatlantic traffic in transit only.

United Kingdom Views

17.(a) United Kingdom authorities at the official level have given us their views on the pending application of the Commercial Cable Company for permission to terminate the cable in the United Kingdom in the following paragraph, which is the draft text of a message which the United Kingdom Government might send to the United States Government. (This text has not yet been cleared by Ministers in the United Kingdom).

"Proposals have been put to the U.K. Government for a cable system between U.S., Canada, Greenland, Iceland and the United Kingdom which, it is understood, would provide for defence needs. The U.K. Government has, of course, no desire to stand in the way of the provision of a new cable if it is essential to defence, but the proposal, as put to the U.K. Government, incorporates advance underwriting by the American Government of a substantial part of the commercial risks of a private venture which, for the rest, depends upon the diversion of traffic from the existing facilities in a competitive situation which is already very favourable to the American Companies. The U.K. Government regret that, in these circumstances, they cannot as at present advised see their way to permitting the projected cable to be used for purposes other than defence. Before informing the Commercial Cable Company accordingly they would be glad to have any further observations that the American Government may wish to offer”.

(b) We understand that the Danish authorities are also considering the implications of the Commercial Cable Company's application and that they appear to hold views similar to those of the United Kingdom. The Danish authorities are also inclined to believe that existing facilities are adequate, but the Danish Government has not yet received a formal application from the Commercial Cable Company.

18. If the recommendations which follow are adopted, it might also be in the best interests of Canada's relations with the United States to inform the U.S. Embassy, who have furnished a formal note on the subject, of the Canadian Government's position in regard to the pending application as stated in para. 19(d). This might be done concurrently with advice to the Commercial Cable Company following a Cabinet decision in the matter. The U.S. Embassy might also be told that if the U.S. Government wishes to separate the defence aspects of the project from the purely commercial side, and to submit a proposal for the landing of a cable in Canada by the U.S. Government to serve defence installations in Greenland, Iceland or the United Kingdom, such a proposal would be given consideration as is customary in defence matters between our two countries.

Recommendations

19. The following proposals are submitted for consideration:

(a) that the Telegraphs Act be amended to provide for licensing of external telecommunications similar to the powers exercised by the Governor-in-Council under the Radio Act, a Bill to be prepared accordingly. (This system should cover facilities not presently subject to the licensing requirements of the Radio Act, and would provide for the attachment of such conditions as the Governor-in-Council might consider to be in the public interest, including such matters as services, routes, physical and technical standards, strategic and operating agreements, rates and rights of transfer);

(b) that among the objectives of this policy of licensing should be the increased development of external telecommunications by companies which are Canadian owned and controlled, and the avoidance of needless duplication of facilities and unreasonable competition, particularly that arising from provision of services as a by-product of U.S. facilities;

(c) for the next few years, it should be recognized that the Government, through the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, is providing at public expense adequate telephone and telegraph facilities between Canada and the United Kingdom, consistent with our general Commonwealth understandings, and that licenses need not be granted for other facilities terminating in Canada that will duplicate these;

(d) that the commercial Cable Company be informed that the Government is prepared to grant landing licenses for the proposed cable, subject to certain technical stipulations, on condition that the Company undertakes not to terminate circuits in the cable in Canada except for:

- (i) defence communication requirements to points outside Canada (in excess of presently available circuits), and/or
- (ii) commercial purposes, but only in respect of circuits which are leased to Canadian owned and controlled telecommunications companies. The nature and extent of the defence communications permitted under (i) above would be defined specifically following further consideration of defence needs.

20. The foregoing would require amendments to existing legislation which would necessarily include penalties for non-compliance, and would have the effect of making possible the termination of the American companies' operations in Canada as their existing agreements with Canadian National Telegraphs and Canadian Pacific Telegraphs expire.

GREAT LAKES FISHERIES CONVENTION

Attached for your information is a copy of the Great Lakes Fisheries Convention signed at Washington on September 10, 1954.¹⁵⁸ The Canadian signatories were Messrs. Arnold Heeney and Stewart Bates, while Walter Bedell Smith and Dr. William C. Herrington signed on behalf of the United States.

2. You will recall that a Convention on this subject was concluded in 1946 and met considerable opposition on the part of United States Senators and Congressmen (principally those from Ohio) because it was designed to give international regulatory powers to a Fishery Commission. Because of this opposition, the United States was unable to ratify that Convention.¹⁵⁹ If the Convention which has now been signed is ratified by both countries it will climax more than fifty years of attempts by both countries to adopt a common approach regarding the conservation and development of the Great Lakes fisheries.¹⁶⁰ The six-man Commission to be established under this Convention will have no regulatory powers: its main job will be to foster research and to seek to abate the predatory sea lamprey which has been causing great damage to the fisheries of these Lakes. In view of the Ohio opposition it seemed unlikely that Lake Erie could be included in a research programme. As a result of the break-off by Canada of negotiations in February, 1953, of the excellent work which the United States negotiators have done since among Ohio fishermen and of the eloquent pleas made in Washington on September 8 by Dr. Stewart Bates, the document signed in Washington approaches what might be termed, for the present, the closest approach to the "ideal" Convention on Great Lakes fisheries embracing research and lamprey control over the five Great Lakes. If the Great Lakes Fisheries Commission does its work properly it should, in a few years time, have a fairly clear idea of the measures required to improve the yield of these fisheries, some of which have been in decline in recent years. The Commission, being empowered to make recommendations to the governments, may then call upon both governments to approve recommendations or to take measures in concert in order to conserve and improve these fisheries.

3. I understand that the Minister of Fisheries will, in due course, introduce legislation to implement the Convention and that he will, at that time, also seek parliamentary approval in order that the instruments of ratification can be exchanged early in the year.

LIBBY DAM APPLICATION

On May 27, 1954 the United States Government submitted to the International Joint Commission a new Application for an order of approval for the construction of a dam on the Kootenay River near Libby, Montana. Under the Commission's Rules of Procedure interested parties have until July 8 in which to file Statements in Response.

2. The proposed dam on the Kootenay River would be primarily a storage reservoir but on-site power would also be available and there would be some beneficial effects in both Canada and the United States in flood control. The proposed dam would create a reservoir about 100 miles in length, the upper 42 miles of which would be in Canada. The project, therefore, requires the approval of the International Joint Commission under Article IV of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. This Article states that the construction of any dam or other obstruction in waters flowing across the boundary, the effect of which is to raise the natural level of the waters on the other side of the boundary, must be approved by the International Joint Commission.

3. An earlier Application for approval of the Libby Dam was filed by the United States Government on January 12, 1951. After consultation with the Government of British Columbia, the Canadian Government filed a Statement in Response dated March 8, 1951 (attached as Appendix A). At public hearings in both countries in 1951, various Canadian and United States interests were heard. It became apparent that wide divergence of opinion existed as to the extent to which Canadian interests should be indemnified by the United States Government for the proposed flooding of Canadian territory and for the proposed use in the United States of this Canadian water resource. The opposing views as presented at these public hearings and in the closed Executive Session of the International Joint Commission may be summarized as follows.

The United States Position:

- (1) The United States Government should be required to pay
 - (a) the value of real property in Canada damaged by the construction and operation of the dam; and
 - (b) the cost of providing alternative facilities for transportation and other services made necessary by the construction and operation of the dam.
- (2) These payments should be made in cash and no other indemnity or recompense should be required.

The Canadian Position

(1) Canada and the Province of British Columbia should preserve all rights under Article II of the Treaty of 1909. (This Article provides that any diversion or interference with waters which flow across the boundary resulting in any injury on the other side of the boundary shall give rise to the same rights and entitle the injured parties to the same legal remedies as if such injury took place in the country where the diversion or interference occurs.)

(2) Any rights which may be granted should be for a period not exceeding the legal life of the project.

(3) Indemnity for loss and property damage and the cost of rehabilitation of facilities should be paid for either in power free of charge or in cash.

(4) Indemnity for loss of resources which could otherwise be used should be in terms of power delivered at cost to the Government of British Columbia. The amount of power would include

- (a) a share of on-site power proportional to the increase made available by encroachment on Canada and in head contributed by the increase in water; and
- (b) a share of down-stream benefits proportional to the land and storage made available in Canada.

4. Before either side had an opportunity to present these divergent views in full to the International Joint Commission, the United States Government, on April 10, 1953, withdrew the Application. The reason given for this action was to permit further study of some of the features of the proposals which adversely affected some United States interests in Montana. No doubt the United States Government was also interested in gaining additional time to study the problems raised by the Canadian demand for recompense for downstream benefits from up-stream storage.

5. On June 8, 1954, shortly after the new Application had been received from the United States Government, the Canadian Government's Interdepartmental Committee on Water Power Problems met to discuss what action should be recommended. (This Committee is composed of senior officials from the Departments of Northern Affairs and National Resources, Mines and Technical Surveys, Trade and Commerce, Finance, National Defence and External Affairs, as well as General McNaughton.) It was agreed at this meeting that in view of the short time limit allowed for the filing of the Statement in Response, it would be advisable for the Committee to prepare a draft Statement in Response which should then be forwarded to the Government of British Columbia for comment before seeking the approval of the Canadian Government. An important new factor considered by the Committee in drafting this Statement was an interim report made available to the Commission by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources concerning the possible diversion of the Kootenay River northward into the Columbia at Canal Flats. Such a diversion might be advantageous as it would appear to result in a net gain in power potential on the Columbia River in Canada, although it would result in a decrease in power potential on the Kootenay River in both Canada and the United States. Full details of this project are not yet available but it appears likely that its advantages to Canada would be offset, in part at least, if a share of the power from Libby were made available to Canada at cost. (The United States Section of the Commission has indicated that the Libby project would be economically unsound if Canada should divert the Kootenay River northward and has suggested that the Canadian Government should therefore make its decision clear in the near future on this possibility.)

6. Attached as Appendix B is the draft Statement in Response as drafted by the Interdepartmental Committee and which was forwarded for comment to the Premier of British Columbia by the Secretary of State for External Affairs under cover of a letter dated June 15.[†] In a reply dated June 21, 1954,[†] Premier Bennett agreed to the general terms of the Canadian Government draft Statement. (The British Columbia Government will, of course, be putting in its own Statement in Response, which is separate from the Canadian Government Statement. However, the Canadian Government Statement is consistent, in all important matters, with the proposed British Columbia Government Statement.)

7. The Interdepartmental Committee also considered the question of designating Counsel for Canada to appear before the Commission at the hearings on this Application which are expected to begin in August of this year. At the suggestion of the Department of External Affairs, the Department of Justice is willing to make one of its officers, Mr. D.H.W. Henry, available to act as Counsel for the Canadian Government before the International Joint Commission on this Application.

Recommendations

8. The Secretary of State for External Affairs recommends:

(1) that the text of the draft Statement in Response to the Libby Dam Application as it appears in Appendix B should be approved;

(2) that, with the concurrence of the Department of Justice, Mr. D.H.W. Henry of that Department should be designated as Counsel for Canada on this Application.¹⁶¹

IN THE MASTER OF THE APPLICATION OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES TO THE INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION, DATED JANUARY 12, 1951, FOR APPROVAL OF THE CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION OF THE LIBBY DAM AND RESERVOIR ON THE KOOTENAY RIVER, NEAR LIBBY, MONTANA

The Government of Canada in response to the above-mentioned Application states that it does not oppose the order of approval which is sought, but submits that the approval should be on conditions to ensure:

(1) the protection and indemnity against injury of all interests in Canada which may be affected by the construction and operation of the said dam and reservoir, as provided by Article VIII of the Boundary Waters Treaty, 1909;

(2) a fair recompense to Canada for the utilization in the project of Canadian natural resources.

IN THE MATTER OF THE APPLICATION OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES TO THE INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION, DATED MAY 22, 1954, FOR APPROVAL OF THE CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION OF THE LIBBY DAM AND RESERVOIR ON THE KOOTENAY RIVER, NEAR LIBBY, MONTANA

STATEMENT IN RESPONSE

In response to the above-mentioned Application, the Government of Canada states that it is not prepared at present either to consent to an Order of Approval or to oppose the granting of such an Order. Sufficient data has not yet been assembled by the International Columbia River Engineering Board to make it possible to determine the most advantageous use of the waters concerned from the points of view of both countries.

If in the light of such a study it is found that more advantageous use of the waters concerned could be achieved by other methods, such as a diversion of the waters of [part of] the Kootenay River into the Columbia River in Canada,¹⁶² the Canadian Government reserves the right to oppose the issuance of an Order of Approval in the present Application.

If, however, it should be found that the issuance of an Order of Approval for the Libby Dam project would be in the best interests of both countries, the Canadian Government submits that any Order of Approval should be on such conditions as to ensure:

(a) the protection and indemnity against injury of all interests in Canada which may be affected by the construction and operation of the said dam and reservoir, as provided by Article VIII of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909;

(b) an equitable recompense to Canada for the use in the project of Canadian natural resources, which will include an amount of power based on the Canadian power potential¹⁶³ at the International Boundary and a share in down-stream benefits of storage in power on a basis to be negotiated;

(c) any rights to the use of storage in Canada which might be approved will be for the life of the present project as expressed in a term of years to be settled in accordance with sound engineering and financing practice;

(d) all considerations which may be deemed relevant as a result of the Commission's study of all engineering and economic factors in the Columbia River Basin in general, and the Kootenay River in particular, should be taken into account.

LIBBY DAM PROJECT

As you directed, I spoke with Mr. Charles Herbert of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources concerning the information which had been received from Dr. John Davis of the Department of Trade and Commerce to the effect that the British Columbia Engineering Committee, which is studying the Libby Dam project, had decided to recommend to the B.C. Government that this project would be advantageous to the Province.

2. Mr. Herbert kindly agreed to provide this Department with a copy of a memorandum which he had prepared for file and which he had checked for accuracy with Dr. Davis. This copy is attached and you will note that it is marked "for the use of External Affairs only". Mr. Herbert felt that it would be inadvisable at this time for General McNaughton to be informed on this matter in view of the confidential nature of the source of the information. Mr. Herbert agreed, however, that it would be proper to show this copy to Mr. D.H.W. Henry.¹⁶⁴

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Lamontagne and I had a talk with Dr. John Davis, Trade and Commerce, who had just returned from a conference of Electrical Engineers at Murray Bay. At that conference he had had discussions with a number of engineers interested in the Columbia River development, and in particular with Mr. Ingledow, Vice-President and Chief Engineer of B.C. Electric.

Mr. Ingledow, at General McNaughton's suggestion, was appointed by Mr. Bennett as a member of the provincial committee to advise Mr. Bennett on matters relating to the development of the Columbia River. Last March, following General McNaughton's visit to Victoria, Mr. Sommers appointed Mr. Ingledow, Mr. Anderson (Consolidated Mining and Smelting), and the newly appointed Chairman of the B.C. Hydro Electric Power Commission as a subcommittee to advise himself and Mr. Bennett as to what attitude the B.C. government should take on the Libby proposal.

Mr. Ingledow told Dr. Davis that this sub-committee, of which he is Chairman, had reported to Mr. Sommers (a) that B.C. should press strongly for as favorable a treatment as possible on downstream benefits, to be paid for in power, and (b) that the province should agree to the Libby project. He said that their reasons for agreeing to the Libby project were firstly, that the province is not at present in the position where it could absorb the amount of power that would accrue to it as payment for downstream benefits from Mica Creek, and secondly, that Mica might well follow as the next big project on the Columbia after Libby. He felt that insufficient information is available to determine which should be the first project to be built on the Canadian side, and therefore that no Canadian project should be considered until the information is available. He disagreed with General McNaughton's view that the construction of Libby would reduce the importance of Mica. General McNaughton had told our Interdepartmental Committee that 20 million acre feet of storage is required above Grand Coulee dam to control the annual flow of the Columbia, but Mr. Ingledow said that this figure was much too low and might perhaps be double. He also disagreed with the view, which has been expressed by General McNaughton, that each subsequent increment of storage is necessarily less valuable in regard to downstream benefits than the previous one. He said that this depends entirely upon the flow characteristics of the river and varies from basin to basin. In certain basins the last increment of storage, up to the point where the annual flow of the river is completely regulated, is the most valuable storage.

Dr. Davis said that it would be helpful if the Water Resources Division of this Department could make a rough estimate of (a) how much storage really is required above Grand Coulee to give complete annual regulation — as opposed to cyclical regulation — of the Columbia — is it closer to 20 million acre feet or 40 million; and (b) taking into account the characteristics of the Columbia, would Mica Creek be more valuable storage if it came before Libby or after? Mr. Lamontagne said that he would ask the Water Resources Division to look into this.

Dr. Davis said that Mr. Ingledow had expressed the view to him that the various press interviews which General McNaughton had given in Victoria last March about the benefits to be derived from the building of Mica Creek dam were most unfortunate. He was apparently quite upset about all this publicity.

Dr. Davis pointed out to us that the fact that Mr. Ingledow is in favour of building Libby before Mica would seem to be quite a blow to General McNaughton's point of view, because Mr. Ingledow is the most influential of the engineers on the B.C. committee. Mr. Anderson, of Consolidated Mining and Smelting, has a definitely prejudiced position because his company is opposed to the whole principle of downstream benefits, and the representative of the B.C. Hydro Commission is a newcomer and has little experience in this matter. It is quite possible, however, that the recent decision of the Federal Power Commission on the transmission of natural gas may have more influence on Mr. Bennett than the opinions of his engineering committee and may cause him to be hostile to the Libby proposal on general grounds.

Mr. Ingledow also told Dr. Davis that he had gathered from officials of the B.C. Attorney-General's office that they are of the opinion that Canada does not have the legal right to divert the Upper Kootenay into the Columbia. This opinion seemed strange to Mr. Lamontagne, Dr. Davis and myself, but it may be of importance if it has some influence on the thinking of Mr. Bennett.

Speaking to Dr. Davis on the telephone this morning, I mentioned that Mr. Lamontagne had told me that Consolidated Mining and Smelting have asked permission to submit a Statement in Response on the Libby question. Dr. Davis pointed out that their chief concern is to see that Consolidated will not be put in the position of having to pay recompense for the downstream benefits from the Libby Dam which they might be regarded as receiving at the West Kootenay plants.

LIBBY DAM

I arrived in Vancouver today with General McNaughton en route to the PJBD meeting. General McNaughton had asked Mr. Pepler (Deputy Attorney General of B.C.) and Mr. Ramsden (head of the Vancouver office of the Water Resources Branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources) to meet him in Vancouver for a short talk, which I attended at General McNaughton's request.

2. General McNaughton said that it was likely that the International Joint Commission would hold an Executive Session late in August, probably in Ottawa, with counsel for all three governments in attendance, to discuss the procedure to be followed and to prepare for subsequent public hearings. I said that Mr. Henry of the Department of Justice had been appointed counsel for the Canadian Government. Pepler said that either he or H.A. McLean of the Attorney General's Department would be counsel for the B.C. Government; Pepler added that he was due to retire from Government service at the end of July, 1954.

3. General McNaughton urged that counsel for the Canadian and B.C. governments get together before the Executive Session. I said that I would suggest to the Department of Justice that they establish direct contact with the Attorney General's Department. I also said that perhaps the two counsel could meet in Ottawa a few days before the Executive Session. Please draft a letter to Justice on this question.

4. General McNaughton expounded the latest information in favour of the Kootenay diversion. Pepler didn't appear to understand the arguments and kept saying that the U.S. wouldn't like it. He said that B.C. was waiting to see what the Canadian Government thought about the diversion and about the basic question of whether we absolutely oppose the Libby application in its present form. I said that the B.C. Government, as owner of the resources, should be the first to decide how they wanted to dispose of those resources — then the Canadian Government could appropriately decide its position. I didn't think that either B.C. or Canada had to take the basic decisions in a hurry — they needn't, for example, be settled prior to the Executive Session of the I.J.C.

5. General McNaughton said that, if B.C. decided that the diversion would some day be done, it followed that the Libby application in its present form must be opposed. However, it would still be possible in his view for the U.S. to make a new plan for a dam further downstream from Libby, which would use the water of the Kootenay originating south of the proposed diversion at Bull River. Such a dam would involve some flooding in Canada but not very much compared to the present application. Pepler seemed surprised at this possibility.

6. Pepler had no idea where the money would even come from for the diversion or for a development at Mica Creek. General McNaughton thought private companies, perhaps in Alberta as well as B.C., would in due course be prepared to finance it. I said that, if the B.C. Government became convinced that its best interests would be served eventually by such a diversion, there was in my view no obligation on B.C. to carry it out forthwith; we were dealing with the use of resources for the indefinite future and we in Canada did not have to let those resources go to the U.S. if we expected to have a better use for them in Canada later on.

7. If Pepler's negative attitude is any indication, I think that the B.C. Government may need considerable education on where its own economic interests lie. Also, the Canadian Government may have to face later the question whether to approve Libby Dam (with downstream benefits, etc.) against its own judgment, just because the B.C. Government is willing to approve it. General McNaughton thinks that the Canadian Government has a duty to the people of Canada higher than the duty to follow what B.C. (as owner of the resources) may be willing to do.

8. Today General McNaughton held an informal meeting with Horsey of the State Department, at which General McNaughton expounded his views not only on downstream benefits but also on the Kootenay Diversion and Mica Creek. The meeting had no status. Horsey just wanted to understand what some influential Canadians, like General McNaughton think.

LIBBY DAM AND COLUMBIA RIVER PROBLEMS

During my tour this week with the PJBD, I had several talks with General McNaughton regarding the Columbia River with special reference to Libby Dam. Although I am not ready to agree with everything the General says, I am convinced of the great importance to Canada of the problems as he explains them. If he is right, it may become necessary for the Canadian Government to oppose the construction of Libby Dam even if the U.S. should be willing to give us "downstream benefits" and even if the B.C. Government should decide to approve Libby Dam.

2. I think that this application may become a source of serious contention between the U.S. Government and the Canadian Government and, therefore, it is important that the Minister should be given a clear exposition of it from the beginning.

3. Of course, numerous excellent memoranda have been sent to the Minister from time to time, but I suggest that it would be worthwhile for the Minister to ask General McNaughton to give him a full personal briefing lasting a couple of hours.

[Washington], September 28, 1954

IN THE MATTER OF THE APPLICATION OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES, TO THE INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION, DATED MAY 22, 1954, FOR APPROVAL OF THE CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION OF THE LIBBY DAM RESERVOIR ON THE KOOTENAY RIVER, NEAR LIBBY, MONTANA

STATEMENT IN REPLY

The Government of the United States notes the views of the Canadian Government and of the Government of the Province of British Columbia and the conditions they consider should be included in an Order of Approval.

The Government of the United States is prepared to cooperate fully with the Governments of Canada and of the Province of British Columbia in the assembly of additional factual data and completion of further studies of the use of the waters concerned by the International Columbia River Engineering Board, but the Government of the United States considers that there is already available sufficient data to justify the conclusion that the Libby Project represents the most advantageous use of the waters concerned from the points of view of both countries and the inhabitants of the areas directly affected and therefore trusts that consideration of the Libby Project will not be delayed on this account.

The Government of the United States agrees that any Order of Approval should include provisions to insure the protection and indemnity of all interests in Canada which may be injured by the construction and operation of the Libby dam and reservoir, as provided by Article VIII of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. The Government of the United States is prepared to consider equitable recompense to Canada, through the sale of power or otherwise, for the value which the Canadian natural resources would have for the production of power, taking into account the extent to which the project will result in compensatory benefits in Canada.

With regard to the stipulation of the Government of the Province of British Columbia on labor, the Government of the United States anticipates no difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory agreement giving preference to Canadian labor on project construction within Canada.

The Government of the United States is prepared to consider favorably the proposal to establish an International Board composed of appropriate representatives from Canada and the United States to set up general rules governing the storage and release of water in the Libby Reservoir.

The Government of the United States is prepared to consider favorably the proposal that the Order of Approval should in no way prejudice the right to the use of water of the Kootenay River in Canada for local consumptive purposes.

On all of these questions and other pertinent matters, the Government of the United States as the applicant is prepared to undertake direct discussions with the parties at interest in Canada with a view to advising the Commission of the extent to which the parties principally concerned are in agreement.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 231-54

[Ottawa], October 26, 1954

LEGISLATION TO PROHIBIT THE CONSTRUCTION, WITHOUT THE PERMISSION OF THE GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL, OF WORKS INTERFERING WITH THE FLOW OF WATER ACROSS THE INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY OR ACROSS AN INTERPROVINCIAL BOUNDARY

1. An arrangement has been made between a company in the United States and the Province of British Columbia whereby the company will be permitted to construct a dam at the foot of Arrow Lakes in British Columbia. The purpose of the proposed dam is to regulate the flow of water in the Columbia River in order to achieve a controlled flow for the development of power at electric power generating plants installed downstream in the United States.

2. The Deputy Minister of Justice has advised that it is within the legislative competence of Parliament to prohibit the construction, without the permission of a named authority, of works that would interfere with the flow of water across the International Boundary but that a definitive opinion as to its constitutional foundation and validity could only be given upon consideration of the actual terms of the proposed legislation.

3. The scope and purposes of the legislation could be limited to the exercise of control over the construction and operation of works regulating water flow for the purposes of developing electric power in the United States. Such limited legislation would not, however, apply in a situation in which the water is to be used for irrigation purposes or some purpose other than the production of electric power. Similarly, if so limited, it would not apply if a situation arose in which the interference with natural flow is designed to divert all or a portion of the natural flow to another water system that does not cross the International Boundary.

4. It is recommended that the broader concept of control of rivers crossing the International Boundary from the standpoint of their most efficient and advantageous use is desirable, rather than the narrower concept of control over water that is to be used in the United States as a particular form of energy.

5. Such legislation, if advisable, could relate to the control of rivers crossing inter-provincial boundaries as well as to those crossing the International Boundary.

6. It is, therefore, proposed that legislation be enacted at the forthcoming session of Parliament which would provide for:

(a) the prohibition, except under licence, of the construction of works in a river, stream or other watercourse that crosses the International Boundary or that crosses an interprovincial boundary, or in any tributary of such river, stream or other watercourse, where such works would interfere with the natural flow of water across the International Boundary or across an interprovincial boundary;

(b) the granting of licenses to construct such works to be in the discretion of the Governor in Council and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem proper as to the location, specifications and continued operation of such works and the uses to which they are put or benefits derived from them;

(c) authority to revoke a licence where a licensee refuses or neglects to comply with its terms and conditions or with any regulations that may be made by the Governor in Council in that behalf; and

(d) penalties for the contravention of any provision of the legislation, including the confiscation and forfeiture of such works and their disposition at the direction of the Governor in Council.

7. Officials of the International Joint Commission, of the Department of External Affairs and of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources have been consulted concerning the proposed legislation and concur in principle.

8. The probable length of the Bill is expected to be from five to ten sections.¹⁶⁵

INVESTIGATION OF THE ECONOMIC FEASIBILITY OF DIVERTING WATER FROM THE COLUMBIA RIVER SYSTEM TO THE FRASER RIVER SYSTEM

The arrangements that will be made in the next few years for the control and use of the water of the Columbia River system will be of the greatest importance to the economy of British Columbia, and of Canada generally in the future. The system provides a major source of cheap energy available in perpetuity. The arrangements for control and benefit are of equal significance to the north Pacific states of the United States. In Washington and Oregon the future industrial expansion will require very large amounts of cheap hydro-electric power. States further south on the Pacific seaboard may also be concerned because of their acute need for water for other uses as well as power. Possibilities of the diversion of water from the northwestern United States to the southwestern United States increase the interest of the northwestern states in water that they may get from Canada. The issues involved in this broad question have been indicated in connection with the agreement entered into by British Columbia for a dam on the Arrow Lakes. That dam, however, involves only a fraction of the total water use problem in the Columbia watershed. In recognition of the importance of this matter, new legislation is being prepared which will ensure that all dams, etc. on international rivers (such as the Columbia) will be under federal control. A specific question has now arisen that raises important issues of policy in this field. It is a proposal that an engineering investigation be undertaken at once to determine the economic feasibility of diverting a substantial amount of water from the Columbia watershed to the Fraser watershed.

The essential points relating to this proposal are outlined in the following paragraphs from a memorandum by the Chairman of the Canadian Section of the International Joint Commission:

"The studies undertaken in the Columbia basin under the auspices of the Canadian Section, I.J.C., to date have disclosed a number of very promising projects for power development on the Columbia River, the major one of these being the proposed Mica Dam and power and storage project. In addition to providing a head of 555 feet, capable of supporting an at-site installed capacity of over one and one-quarter million kilowatts, together with as much more at the two sites downstream which are capable of use as run-of-river developments, this project using Columbia River water only would store over ten million acre-feet of flood water every year which would be released during seasons of low flow to increase power generation at downstream plants in Canada and possibly also in the United States. Energy created from this stored water with complete river development downstream from Mica Dam in Canada and the United States together would total approximately 20 billion kilowatt hours, of which 10 billion kilowatt hours might be added to power production in the United States if the stored water is allowed to flow out of Canada.

"However, preliminary studies show that the water stored at Mica could be diverted into the headwaters of the South Thompson and thence into the Fraser River. Thus, instead of half of the energy developed by the water stored in Mica Creek reservoir in Canada being allowed to pass across the boundary for use in the United States, all the energy generated from this water amounting to approximately an additional 10 billion kilowatt hours per annum would be generated and retained for use in Canada.

"In recent weeks the British Columbia Government and the Canadian Section of the International Joint Commission have been approached by United States interests which have upwards of 300 million dollars immediately available and which they desire to spend on the construction of the Mica Dam for the storage it will provide for power plants existing on the Columbia River in the United States. Should this dam be built and the stored water allowed to flow across the international boundary, and should it be taken into use in power and irrigation projects in the United States, an appropriation may become established under Western water law applicable both in the United States and in Canada, and as a consequence it may not then be possible legally for Canada subsequently to divert the flow for use elsewhere, as this would cause extensive disruption and injury to United States industry, for which Canada might be held liable to make compensation under the specific provisions of Article II of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, and the Act of Parliament, Chap. 28, 1-2 George V, May 1911.¹⁶⁶ The procedure to protect Canada against such liability would be to make a reservation of the water in advance of its being taken into use in the United States, and this can only be done on the basis of specific engineering information and definite practicable plans, not presently available.

"It is therefore vital to Canada's interests that before the Mica project is built that the engineering feasibility and the economic practicability of diverting Columbia River system water into the headwaters of the Fraser River system be determined."

General McNaughton has recommended that an amount of $250,000 be included in the estimates of the Engineering and Water Resources Branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources so that an investigation of the economic feasibility of diversion can be undertaken during the coming year. With regard to the proposal the following points should be noted:

¹⁶⁶ Voir/See Canada, Treaties and Agreements affecting Canada in force between His Majesty and the United States of America with Subsidiary Documents, 1814-1925, Ottawa, King's Printer, 1927, pp. 312-319.

(a) There appears to be no question but that a diversion to the Fraser system is a physical possibility.

(b) There is no doubt about the legality of a diversion. The right to divert in a case like this is specifically reserved in the Boundary Waters Treaty. There would be a right of action before the Exchequer Court of Canada by any party in the United States that could show that it had suffered economic damage through the diversion, but in order to prove injury it would have to show a prior allocation of the water. This is a part of the urgency of the recommendation. The diversion that is in contemplation would involve water that is at present not stored or otherwise "allocated". If it is put under control for use on the lower Columbia there will then be an "allocation" and it could not later be diverted for use in Canada without payment of prohibitive damages.

(c) The economic feasibility of diversion can only be determined by extensive studies of the nature envisaged by General McNaughton. The investigations will involve field surveys, topographic mapping, determination of the cost of structures involved in diversion, comparison of the power possibilities and costs with possible benefits from power development on the Columbia, etc. A full investigation will probably cost several times $250,000 if it is necessary to carry it through in its entirety.

(d) The diversion would, according to present information, not increase the danger of flooding on the Fraser River since the water would be released only at times of low flow.

(e) Because of the importance of fishery interests on the Fraser River, and also because of other factors, there is probably no other possibility of storing water so that the power potential of the Fraser can be developed. It is considered that it would be possible by means of the diversion to develop the power in such a way that fisheries would not be injured.

(f) While there is no question as to the legality of a diversion it can be expected that even the intimation that Canada is considering the possibility of diversion will lead to vigorous protest from the interested parties in the United States.

(g) The government of British Columbia is aware that a diversion is possible and that consideration is being given to its economic feasibility. The British Columbia Electric Company has shown some interest in building the necessary dam at Mica and participating in an overall project.

(h) There is every reason to believe that there will be a need for all the hydro-electric power that can possibly be produced and that, even with this, there may well be a shortage in the foreseeable future.

(i) A project involving a diversion into the Fraser would be essentially the same as the Frobisher scheme, which involves a diversion from the Yukon River (which in its natural course flows through Alaska). In connection with it, and in other contexts, the government has taken the position that if energy resources in Canada can be economically used in Canada, they shall be so used and that it will not agree to their allocation, in perpetuity, for use outside of Canada.

The above are briefly the essential considerations in connection with this proposal. A further point that has to be kept in mind is that the investigation of the economic feasibility of the diversion, at considerable cost, might be desirable even if there were a virtual certainty that the diversion would never take place. There are now under way and there will in the next few years be extremely important negotiations with the United States, before the International Joint Commission and otherwise, involving projects for dams and power development in the Columbia River basin. Most of the storage and control features will be in Canada, or will require Canadian participation, but most of the resulting power will be produced in the United States. In negotiations the Canadian position thus far has been that power is the product of flow and head and that equal importance must be given to each. On that basis it has been made clear that Canada should receive a very substantial "downstream benefit" or share of the power produced downstream in the United States — as a result of any controls or storage established upstream in Canada. The United States has not conceded this principle and, even if the principle is conceded, it will be a matter of hard negotiation to get agreement on a share of the benefits that will be in any way equitable to Canada unless Canada has established a very strong bargaining position. That bargaining position will not be strong unless it is clear that there is some way of using the water resources other than by controlling them to produce power in the United States. If it could be shown that a diversion into the Fraser system is economically feasible, the Canadian bargaining position in all the Columbia River negotiations would be enormously improved. While it might cost $250,000 or more to establish that position, the cost would be a trifle as compared with the increased returns that would be derived through greater downstream benefits in perpetuity.

Having regard for the very great importance to Canada in future years of low-cost hydro-electric power, I would suggest that our position might become delicate if we refused to investigate a possibility that may have the effect of yielding an enormous benefit to this country for all time to come. In the circumstances, and notwithstanding the certainty that vigorous protest from interests in the United States may be expected, I recommend that approval be given to the inclusion of an item for $250,000 in the estimate of the Engineering and Water Resources Branch in 1955-56, to study the economic feasibility of a diversion of presently uncontrolled and unallocated water from the Columbia to the Fraser River system.

The item would not involve a special vote, nor would it be labelled as being for a possible diversion. It would form a part of the present vote for work on the Columbia system.

If the item is approved, the Secretary of State for External Affairs might wish to consider whether, at an early date, the State Department should be advised of this study so that it may be made clear in advance that this does not involve any decision that a diversion of unallocated water should or should not take place — that it is simply to ascertain whether it would be economically feasible.

POSSIBLE USE OF COLUMBIA FLOODWATERS IN CONJUNCTION WITH FRASER RIVER¹⁶⁷

As the Minister informed you earlier this month, Cabinet agreed on December 1 that the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources should include a sum of $250,000 for studies to be undertaken in 1955 to investigate the engineering and economic factors involved in a possible diversion of Columbia River floodwaters for use in the Fraser River Basin. At that time, Cabinet directed that the United States Government be advised of this study.

2. It was agreed, after consultations with appropriate authorities, that Canada's interest might best be served if

(a) the matter were treated as far as possible, as a domestic one; i.e. the Canadian Government has decided to extend the general surveys now being conducted on the Columbia River Basin to include all facets including a possible diversion of floodwaters from the Columbia River Basin into the Fraser Basin; and

(b) the timing and manner of making a public announcement were selected by the Canadian Government (if possible). Such a public announcement might be made by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources on or about December 24.

3. Following Cabinet's decision to inform the United States Government, Wershof conveyed the information to Bliss on December 14. The language used by Wershof was along the following lines:

"The studies which the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources has had under way for several years in connection with the Columbia River Basin were recently reviewed by the Minister of that Department and other interested government officials. Much interest was shown in the long-term development of the upper Columbia and indeed in the development of Canada's water resources in the basins west of the Canadian Rockies. It was agreed that the studies which the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources are doing in connection with the use of the waters of the Columbia River should include whatever combinations and permutations may be practicable in the Canadian interest, including the use of two basins in conjunction with one another, such as by diverting flood waters from the Columbia River for use at power sites along the Fraser. This naturally involves problems such as flood control and conservation of fisheries in the Fraser River Basin which require close examination. These are, of course, only studies of an economic and engineering nature and a government decision is unlikely until these have been concluded."

¹⁶⁷ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

(this was delivered by hand by Mr. Wershof to the Embassy on Dec 15) [M.H. Wershof]

4. Bliss appeared to realize the significance of such a potential diversion. The point was made clear that this was merely a study, of which it was thought that the United States should be informed as a matter of courtesy. We had not thought through whether a public announcement should be made. If one were made, it might be made by Northern Affairs and National Resources shortly before Parliament reconvenes.

5. It would also be useful if you could find a suitable opportunity to inform the State Department orally of the intentions of the Canadian Government as regards these studies. No written communication should be left at the State Department.

6. For your background information only, a possible diversion of Columbia River floodwaters could take place above Revelstoke at a point seven miles from Summit Lake which is the origin of the Eagle and South Thompson Rivers. Water could flow thence through SHUSWAP Lake and the South Thompson River to join the Fraser River at Lytton, B.C. Owing to lack of complete storage and control facilities, a large amount of the floodwater of the Columbia River cannot now be used for power or other purposes.

7. As you know, the United States Corps of Engineers is much further advanced in its studies of the U.S. portion of the Columbia River Basin. Its studies started in 1932 and a main Report No. 308 (costing several million dollars) was issued in 1948.¹⁶⁸ Our own studies started only after the Columbia River Basin Reference in 1944, and will not be completed for at least three years or so.

8. For your own information, we are examining with the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources the advisability of that Department making a public announcement, possibly on December 24. If this is agreed, Bliss would get a copy of the announcement the day before it is made and a copy would also be sent to you.¹⁶⁹

POSSIBLE USE OF COLUMBIA FLOOD WATERS IN CONJUNCTION WITH THE FRASER RIVER

As suggested in your unnumbered telegram of December 14 that Wershof brought to the Embassy, we spoke yesterday to Vest on the State Department's Canadian Desk. Our explanation was made in language very similar to that used by Wershof when he spoke to Bliss. We emphasized that what was contemplated at the present time was merely a study of the possible uses of the waters in the Upper Columbia River basin and that no decision would be taken by the Canadian Government until that study had been completed.

2. Vest showed keen interest in the information and asked us to repeat that part of our statement in which we referred to the "diverting of flood waters from the Columbia River basin". Vest said that he could not comment officially at the moment but it occurred to him that there were one or two points on which the United States might seek additional information later on. His first point was that if Canada decided eventually to go ahead with this proposal there might be important implications for the United States power plants on the Lower Columbia. He did not know, he explained, whether these plants had been built with the capacity to use the flood waters from the Columbia for generating electric power or whether the flood waters were merely permitted to by-pass the power installations. If it was the case that flood waters were, or could be, used by the existing plants, then the consequences to the United States of the Canadian proposal would be especially interesting.

3. Vest's second point was that there was some doubt in his mind whether the studies that Northern Affairs and National Resources has had under way for several years arose out of the reference to the I.J.C., or whether they were studies undertaken by Canada independently of the I.J.C. reference. He presumed that they were not independent but asked us to get your official confirmation on this point.

4. Needless to say, we, too, would be interested in the answers to the points raised by Vest; particularly the first one. We should be grateful, also if at your convenience you could give us whatever information may be available to you on the possible relationship between the proposed Columbia-Fraser project and the Mica Creek project. We would be interested to know especially whether these two projects would be alternatives to each other or whether they would be mutually exclusive.

5. We were pleased to see that you intend to give Bliss an advance copy of any public statement that might be made. Although we did not mention the possibility of a statement to Vest we wondered whether, since we have paralleled your actions so far, it might not be useful for us to tell him that a statement may be made near Christmas.

POLLUTION OF RAINY RIVER IN THE VICINITY OF INTERNATIONAL FALLS, MINNESOTA, AND FORT FRANCIS, ONTARIO

In Note No. 204 dated April 9, 1954,[†] the Ambassador of the United States of America informed the Secretary of State for External Affairs that representations have been made to the United States Government alleging that the Rainy River in the vicinity of International Falls, Minnesota, and Fort Francis, Ontario, is being polluted by industrial wastes from a neighbouring plant, with ruinous effects on fish life and the use of the stream for fishing. Pollution of this nature is contrary to the provisions of Article IV of the Boundary Waters Treaty signed January 11, 1909, which states that boundary waters and waters flowing across the boundary shall not be polluted on either side to the injury of health or property on the other side.¹⁷⁰ The United States Ambassador therefore suggested that a reference should be made to the International Joint Commission under Article IX of the Boundary Waters Treaty of January 11, 1909, directing the Commission to make a thorough investigation of the matter and to submit a report to the two Governments with recommendations of remedial measures which might be taken to eliminate the pollution of this river.

¹⁷⁰ Voir/See Canada, Treaties and Agreements affecting Canada in force between His Majesty and the United States of America with Subsidiary Documents, 1814-1925, Ottawa, King's Printer, 1927, pp. 312-319.

2. It is proposed by the Government of the United States that the reference to the Commission by both Governments should be in the same terms as the Reference of April 1, 1946¹⁷¹ which concerned pollution of the waters of the St. Clair River, Lake St. Clair and the Detroit River and which was later extended to include waters of the St. Mary's River from Lake Superior to Lake Huron and the waters of the Niagara River from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario), substituting the words "Rainy River" for the names of all the waters mentioned in the earlier Reference. A copy of the Reference with the suggested substitution is attached as Appendix A.

3. The results of the investigations made by the Commission under the earlier Reference into the pollution of these boundary waters were set forth in a report dated October 11, 1950, in which remedial measures were recommended.¹⁷² Both Governments accepted the recommendations and charged the Commission with their implementation.

Recommendation

4. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, with the concurrence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, recommends that if the Government of the Province of Ontario agrees, the United States Ambassador be informed that the Canadian Government concurs in the suggestion of his Government that a reference in the sense of the attached draft concerning pollution of Rainy River be forwarded to the International Joint Commission.¹⁷³

Ottawa, _____

Sir,

I have the honour to advise you that the Governments of the United States and Canada have been informed that the waters of the Rainy River are being polluted by sewage and industrial wastes emptied into these waters. Having in mind the provisions of Article IV of the Boundary Waters Treaty signed January 11, 1909, that boundary waters and waters flowing across the boundary shall not be polluted on either side to the injury of health or property on the other side, the two Governments have agreed upon a joint Reference of the provisions of Article IX of the said

¹⁷² Voir/See Volume 17, Document 855.

¹⁷³ Approuvé par le Cabinet le 14 juin 1954./Approved by Cabinet, June 14, 1954.

Treaty. The Commission is requested to inquire into and to report to the two Governments upon the following questions:

(1) Are the waters referred to in the preceding paragraph actually being polluted on either side of the boundary to the injury of health or property on the other side of the boundary?

(2) If the foregoing question is answered in the affirmative, to what extent, by what causes, and in what localities is such pollution taking place?

(3) If the Commission should find that pollution of the character just referred to is taking place, what measures for remedying the situation would, in its judgment, be most practicable from the economic, sanitary and other points of view?

(4) If the Commission should find that the construction or maintenance of remedial or preventive works is necessary to render the waters sanitary and suitable for domestic and other uses, it should indicate the nature, location, and extent of such works, and the probable cost thereof, and by whom and in what proportions such cost should be borne.

For the purpose of assisting the Commission in making the investigation and recommendations provided for in this Reference, the two Governments will, upon request, make available to the Commission the services of engineers and other specially qualified personnel of their governmental agencies, and such information and technical data as may have been acquired by such agencies or as may be acquired by them during the course of the investigation.

The Commission should submit its report and recommendations to the two Governments as soon as practicable.

I have, etc.,

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], November 16, 1954

My dear Premier,

You will recall that in 1946 the Canadian Government agreed with the Government of Ontario that a Reference should be made to the International Joint Commission on the subject of the pollution of boundary waters in the connecting channels of the Great Lakes.

Since that time the International Joint Commission has studied the pollution of these waters and, on October 11, 1950, submitted a report to the Governments of Canada and the United States. As you may remember, the Commission found "that the boundary waters under reference are being polluted on either side of the boundary to the injury of health and property on the other side of the boundary". This meant that the pollution was then in excess of that which Canada and the United States agreed to prevent when they ratified Article IV of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. This Article states in part, "... the waters herein defined as boundary waters ... shall not be polluted on either side to the injury of health or property on the other side". Both countries seemed, at the time of the 1950 Report, to bear about the same responsibility for this state of affairs though pollution was reported — in many instances — to be heavier on the United States side of the boundary. The Commission, therefore, recommended the adoption of "Objectives for Boundary Waters Quality Control" by the Governments of Canada and the United States as criteria to be met in preventing the pollution contemplated by the Treaty.

The Commission's recommendation was, after consultation with your Government, accepted by the Governments of the United States and Canada and the International Joint Commission was requested to establish and maintain continuing supervision of the pollution of boundary waters in the connecting channels of the Great Lakes system in order to ensure compliance with the "Objectives". This supervision has been accomplished through the Technical Advisory Board of the Commission which has co-operated closely with the State and provincial authorities concerned.¹⁷⁴

It is a source of satisfaction for me to be able to tell you that the Commission has reported that it has received excellent co-operation generally with regard to the abatement of pollution of boundary waters from industrial sources, including the oil refineries in the Sarnia area, and that a solution to the phase of the problem dealing with industrial pollution seems to be in sight. Unfortunately, the Chairman of the Canadian Section of the International Joint Commission, General McNaughton, has had to report to the Canadian Government towards the end of September, 1954 that the situation with regard to the pollution of boundary waters by the discharge of municipal sewage and waste in Ontario continues to cause anxiety. I am informed that little visible progress has been made in Canada towards the solution of this very serious problem. I believe that General McNaughton has kept you and your colleague, the Minister of Health, fully informed of the difficulties in this regard.

At the semi-annual meeting of the International Joint Commission held in Ottawa on October 7, 1954, the Attorney General for Michigan, the Hon. Frank G. Willard, made strong representations to the Commission to the effect that Canada was polluting the water supply of municipalities in Michigan and, in particular, that of Detroit, in violation of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. Your officials will doubtless have brought these allegations to your attention.

The continued discharge of raw sewage into the connecting channels of the Great Lakes system may be not only detrimental to the health and welfare of the people living on both sides of the international boundary but may — at any given moment — constitute a violation by Canada of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 as regards the pollution of these waters. Such an occurrence would naturally have serious repercussions on Canada's relations with the United States. I feel confident, however, that your Government is mindful of this and is taking whatever effective and practical steps are open to it to remedy this situation. Accordingly, I would be grateful if you would acquaint me with the steps which you are taking, in conjunction with the municipalities bordering the connecting channels of the Great Lakes, for the abatement of the pollution of boundary waters through municipal sewage and waste.

Yours sincerely,

LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT

*Premier of Ontario

Toronto, December 23, 1954

My dear Prime Minister:

I have delayed replying to your letter of November 16, 1954 relating to the pollution of boundary waters, in order that I should have a full opportunity to discuss this matter with my colleagues and other officials.

The problem, of course, goes back a great many years and although we have had it under continuing study for some time, it does not lend itself to an easy or quick solution. Many factors have contributed to the pollution of the boundary rivers and lakes. The rapid industrial and urban growth during the last fifteen years of war and post-war expansion, when supplies of materials and labour were scarce, have undoubtedly aggravated the situation, but the financial stringency of the municipalities and the deferment of proper sewage works during the 1930's have also been contributing factors.

In your letter, you refer to the improvements that have been made in the control of industrial waste. The improvements adopted by some industries are indeed gratifying, but it is evident that it is the industrial development which has brought with it a concentration of urban population which is still the main source of the pollution. This emphasizes a point I have made on occasions at Federal-Provincial conferences that a province with a relatively large volume of industrial development requires substantially greater revenues to meet the economic costs of pollution and traffic congestion and other problems in the fields of health and welfare than one which does not experience it and have these difficulties.

The fact that many industrial plants find it advantageous, owing to their heavy consumption of water or the availability of shipping facilities, to locate near the boundary waters, and that these plants draw other feeder industries to the same locality, accentuates the whole problem. For example, the establishment of the Polymmer Corporation at Sarnia has drawn to that area both oil industries and chemical plants. These companies use large quantities of water and create difficult waste problems. In several instances in this area, phenolic substances are discharged into the St. Clair River. These wastes have high waste-producing properties that are extremely difficult to remove in their entirety. Increased production and changes in the processes often cause increased pollution. An illustration of the latter is the recent change to catalytic cracking in the production of gasoline, which leaves a waste containing a much greater phenolic content.

Some of the offending plants discharge their wastes directly into the rivers or lakes, while others are connected to the public sewers, thereby adding very materially to the municipal problem of waste disposal. In these later instances, too much of the burden has been shifted from industry to the municipality.

Continuous contact has been maintained by our officials with those industries having waste disposal problems. They have been advised of our requirements, and most of them have gone far to remedy the situation. In the Sarnia area, some industries have been able to substantially reduce their discharges of phenolic waste, but the migration of similar industries to this area and the expansion of existing plants have left the overall picture less satisfactory than might be desired.

Now that man-power and material resources are in ample supply, the major obstacle to providing the sewers and the sewage treatment plants that are required to minimize pollution is financial. Our officials and facilities have been made available for the investigation of pollution in the boundary waters, and a close bond of co-operation has prevailed between our officers and those of your Department of Health and the International Joint Commission, as you have recognized in your letter. To stimulate and assist in the construction of waterworks and sewage disposal plants, we established the Municipal Improvement Corporation five years ago to make loans to municipalities for these purposes. In recent years, the number of disposal plants in the Province has been increased by 50 per cent. The majority of these have been for complete or secondary rather than partial treatment. A number of treatment plants has been enlarged and many others are in the development stage. Today this Province has twice as many plants for complete treatment as all the rest of Canada.

While the expansion of sewage treatment has made good progress in many parts of Ontario, it has, however, made less headway in some of the border municipalities. The expenditures required in many of these cases are extremely large and may be beyond the capacity of these municipalities to finance out of their own resources. We recognize the gravity of the pollution problem and the necessity for finding a solution. We are advising the municipalities concerned that it is imperative for remedial measures to be adopted. The Province, on its part, will continue to review the situation and assist where it is able.

The pollution of our boundary waters, however, again emphasizes the heavy financial burdens and responsibilities that rest upon a Province which has a concentration of industry and population. While the huge industrial development experienced by Ontario has undoubtedly added to the tax resources of the Province and of the Federal Government, at the same time it has added very greatly to the demands upon the Ontario Government for the extension of provincial services. For Ontario to earn a corporation tax dollar, it has to make many commitments, including the pledging of its credit for the expansion of hydro-electric power, which are not required by a province which receives a corporation tax dollar containing a great deal of subsidy. For this reason, I firmly believe that the abatement of pollution should be considered as part of the broader Federal-Provincial fiscal problem.

Yours sincerely,

LESLIE M. FROST

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], January 30, 1954

THE CHICAGO DIVERSION

In teletype No. WA-157, dated January 27, 1954,† a copy of which is attached, the Embassy in Washington reports that a Bill (H.R. 3300) authorizing an increase of 1,000 cubic feet per second outflow in the Chicago Diversion was reported favourably and without amendment by the Committee on Public Works of the House of Representatives on January 11th. The Embassy reports, further, that in the opinion of the United States officials concerned, the Bill may be called up at any time and it may be approved with little or no discussion especially if it could be presumed that Canada had no objections to it. (The Deputy Legal Adviser of the State Department informed the House Public Works Committee, during the hearings on a similar Bill in 1952, that the Canadian authorities "had consistently taken the position that an increased diversion by Chicago would be of concern to Canada". It is not expected, however, that this statement would be sufficient to prevent the House from adopting the Bill, especially since the State Department's own opposition to it, later reaffirmed in a letter to the Committee last year, have been insufficient to block the Bill on the Committee).

When the previous Bill referred to was brought to the attention of the Canadian Cabinet on July 31, 1952, Cabinet agreed that if it appeared that the 82nd Congress might give further consideration to the measure, the Ambassador in Washington should be instructed to inform the United States State Department of Canadian views regarding the proposal for an increase in the Chicago Diversion along the lines of a draft attached to a memorandum you put before Cabinet at that time. The circumstances now are precisely the same as those which obtained at the time of the Cabinet's approval of the course of action recommended in July, 1952. As considerable time has elapsed, however, you may wish to discuss with your colleagues principally concerned — the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources — whether the Ambassador in Washington should be instructed to address a note to the State Department now along the lines of that previously authorized by Cabinet.

Attached is a draft of the proposed note which has been suitably amended to refer to action by the present Congress. Also attached for your signature, if you approve, are letters addressed to your colleagues, the Ministers of Transport and or Northern Affairs and National Resources, sending them copies of the telegram from Washington referred to above and asking their concurrence in the recommendation that the Ambassador in Washington be now instructed to address to the State Department the note authorized by Cabinet in July, 1952. Copies of the proposed draft note and of your memorandum to the Cabinet dated July 21, 1952,[†] are also enclosed for their information.

One point made by the State Department in opposing the Bill before the House Public Works Committee was that the question of the Chicago Diversion is a matter currently before the International Joint Commission under the Lake Ontario Water Level Reference of June 25, 1952, under which the International Joint Commission was asked to study the effect of all diversions into and out of the Great Lakes.¹⁷⁵ This aspect of the matter was not mentioned in the memorandum to Cabinet or the draft note attached to it, because consideration of the Reference to the International Joint Commission and consideration of the memorandum to the Cabinet had not been interrelated at that time. As the State Department has made use of this argument, however, it is suggested that their position be supported by the addition of a paragraph at the end of the present draft. Another argument put forward by the State Department is that the change in the Chicago Diversion might affect the arrangements set forth in the Niagara Treaty of 1950;¹⁷⁶ although the Embassy has suggested that such a consideration might be appropriately added to the main arguments of our note, any special emphasis on our interests at Niagara might detract from the assertion of our interests in the St. Lawrence River. It is suggested, therefore, that the additional paragraph should omit this point and that it be worded somewhat as follows:

“As the Chicago Diversion is one aspect of a matter now before the International Joint Commission, pursuant to the Reference submitted jointly by the Governments of Canada and the United States on June 25, 1952, it is suggested that the interests of Canada and the United States would best be served by allowing the International Joint Commission to complete its study of this and related matters under the arrangements already agreed upon”.

The attached letters for your signature, addressed to the Ministers of Transport and Northern Affairs and National Resources, also request their concurrence in this suggested addition.

The Legal Division of the Department concurs in this recommendation, including the suggestion for the additional paragraph mentioned above.¹⁷⁷

CHICAGO DIVERSION

With reference to the telephone conversation between Messrs. LePan and Côté, quoted below is the text of a note which you should prepare for transmission to the State Department as soon possible. The note is the same as that approved by Cabinet in July 1952, with a few small modifications, required by present circumstances, and with an additional paragraph supporting the point made by the State Department in its representations to the House Public Works Committee with regard to the status of the matter before the International Joint Commission under the Lake Ontario Water Level Reference of June 25, 1952.

2. In submitting the note to the State Department, you should also comment orally on the letter which Assistant Secretary Morton addressed to the House Public Works Committee on July 15, 1953, as reported in House Report No. 1100. This comment should be along the lines that:

"We were interested to note the line they had taken in connection with the levels of Lake Ontario. In doing so, they had quoted part of the text of our Note No. X-51 of February 27, 1952, only. The argument advanced by the State Department as to the levels, however, is not strictly accurate (as you know the State Department would have wanted it to be) without the information contained in our Note No. X-262 of November 4, 1952. This last note stated that because of additional information then available, the previous calculated effect of Gut Dam on the level of Lake Ontario (expressed in Note X-51) was greatly exaggerated."

2. Following is the text of the note: Quote:

Sir:

On instructions of my Government I should like to draw attention to the House of Representatives Bill H.R. 3300 which was reported favourably by the Committee on Public Works of the House of Representatives on January 11, 1954 (H.R. Report No. 1100).

The bill would authorize the State of Illinois and the Sanitary District of Chicago, under the supervision and direction of the Secretary of the Army to withdraw from Lake Michigan, in addition to all domestic pumpage, an annual average of 2500 cubic feet per second, to flow into the Illinois waterway for a period of three years. It also provides that the Secretary of the Army shall study the effects of the increased diversion so authorized and shall report to the Congress on or before January 31, 1956.

Although H.R. 3300 authorizes an increase in the diversion only for a limited period, the Canadian Government is of the opinion that adoption of such a measure and, indeed, any increase in the diversion at Chicago, would impair the power potential of the Niagara and the St. Lawrence Rivers and would have an adverse effect upon navigation in the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River.

With regard to the power aspect of the matters, the Government of Canada wishes to bring to the attention of the Government of the United States the fact that the proposed increase, if continued, would result in the reduction of the total power potential of the Niagara River and the International Rapids Section of the St. Lawrence River of 39,000 continuous horse-power. On the wholly Canadian reach of the St. Lawrence River, the reduction of actual and potential continuous power would be 13,000 horse-power.

Any increase in the Chicago diversion will cause reductions in the water levels of the Great Lakes, the St. Lawrence River and the Port of Montreal which will have a detrimental effect on Canadian as well as United States navigation facilities, particularly in the years of low stage in the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system. The water levels in the Great Lakes system have recently been high but reductions in levels in the lower lakes and the river would, of necessity, follow increases in diversion at Chicago by several years. It is evident that the proposed increase does not offer a source of relief from high water and that the ultimate lowering of levels could obtain at times when, in the ordinary cyclical nature of lake supply, critically low lake stages are being experienced.

It may be concluded that the beneficial flood protection aspects of any increase in the Chicago diversion would be small and short-lived; the detrimental effect on navigation interests would continue over long periods, and the damage to the power potential of the Niagara and the St. Lawrence Rivers would be substantial and continuous. The Canadian Government wishes to point out, therefore, that in these respects, any increase in the Chicago diversion would be prejudicial to the rights and interests of both Canada and the United States.

As the Chicago diversion is one aspect of a matter now before the International Joint Commission, pursuant to the Reference submitted jointly by the Governments of Canada and the United States on June 25, 1952, it is suggested that the interests of Canada and the United States would best be served by allowing the International Joint Commission to complete its study of this and related matters under the arrangements already agreed upon. Unquote.¹⁷⁸

[Ottawa], March 5, 1954

CHICAGO DIVERSION

As you know, an interdepartmental meeting was held on February 24 to discuss the legislation to authorize an increase in the Chicago diversion now before the Congress. It was decided at that meeting that, although Canada would have a strong case on which to base objection if and when the legislation was passed, a formal protest should be withheld until immediately after both Houses of the Congress had passed the legislation and it would be before the President for signature. The meeting also considered that it might prove useful to make further oral representations through the Embassy in Washington to ensure that our views were put before the Senate Committee which is now considering the legislation.

2. Meanwhile, the Embassy in Washington has sent a telegram (WA-312 of February 25, 1954)† to advise that the Senate Public Works Committee — rather than the Foreign Relations Committee — will deal with the Resolution to authorize an increase in the Chicago diversion. The State Department has expressed to the Committee its objection to the legislation but it is unlikely that the Public Works Committee will pay as much attention to the international implications of the proposal as the Foreign Relations Committee would have done.

3. Following informal discussions with officials of the State Department, the Embassy has recommended that a further note reaffirming the Canadian position with respect to the proposed increase would be of assistance to the State Department in strengthening its position before the Committee. In view of this, a draft note has been prepared which might be delivered to the State Department by the Embassy immediately with the request that its contents be brought to the attention of the Senate. A copy is attached for your approval. This note goes very little further than the note already delivered on February 1st, except that it makes specific reference to the relevant provisions of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 and to the use of the waters of the Niagara River for power purposes, as authorized in the Niagara Treaty of 1950. It has been cleared with the Legal Division and the Departments concerned. For these reasons, I should think this note might be sent to the State Department immediately. May I have your directions in this regard?¹⁷⁹

4. You will recall that Wisconsin and other States bordering on the Great Lakes initiated the action which resulted in the Supreme Court Order of April 1930 limiting the diversion to its present level. It would appear that, if the pending legislation to authorize an increase in the diversion is enacted, this Supreme Court Order would be superseded. To clarify this point, however, it is also suggested that the State Department be asked for its views as to what would be the status, in United States law, if this legislation is passed, of any action brought before United States Courts to maintain the limitation imposed by the Order.

5. The fact that the present bill has been referred to the Senate Public Works Committee rather than the Foreign Relations Committee may afford an opportunity for opponents of the measure, if and when it reaches the floor of the Senate, to have it referred at that time to the Foreign Relations Committee, thus imposing an additional and more formidable obstacle to its passage. The Embassy in Washington might also suggest this tactic orally to the State Department as worthy of exploration.

6. As mentioned above, at the meeting on February 24 it was decided to recommend that, if and when legislation was passed by the Senate as well as the House of Representatives, a formal objection to the implementation of this legislation be lodged with the State Department immediately. In the last paragraph of Telegram WA-312 of February 25, the Embassy has also supported this recommendation. In anticipation of this turn of events, a draft note of formal protest is now being prepared and will be put forward for your consideration under cover of a draft memorandum to the Cabinet as soon as it has been cleared with the various departments concerned.¹⁸⁰

Following is the text of note to the Secretary of State referred to in my immediately preceding teletype. Text Begins:

Quote: On instructions of my Government, I should like to draw attention to my Note No. 79 of February 1, 1954, concerning Bill H.R. 3300, approved by the House of Representatives on February 4, 1954, which would authorize an increase in the diversion of water from Lake Michigan through the Chicago Drainage Canal.

As stated in my note of February 1st, the Canadian Government considers that the adoption of this measure, which will increase the diversion at Chicago by 1,000 cubic feet per second, would have an adverse effect on navigation in the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence River. The effect will be particularly marked in periods of low stage and recent lowering of lake levels indicates that a cycle of low levels may be experienced in the near future. These periods of low water have always occurred in irregular cycles of varying duration. If the supply of water is reduced during a cycle of low levels, very serious injury to navigation in boundary waters will undoubtedly result.

In this connection, I should like to draw your attention to Article II of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. The terms of the last paragraph of that Article clearly affirm the understanding that neither party to the treaty surrenders "any right which it may have to object to any interference with or diversion of waters on the other side of the boundary the effect of which would be productive of material injury to the navigation interests on its own side of the boundary". If the proposed increase in the diversion at Chicago were to take place, the Government of Canada would, in the circumstances described above, consider that there would be material injury to the navigation interests on its side of the boundary.

With regard to the power aspect of this matter, it was stated in my previous note that the increased diversion at Chicago would result in a reduction of the power potential of the Niagara and St. Lawrence rivers and the extent of that reduction, in so far as it concerns Canada, was indicated. Under the provisions of Article II of the Treaty between the United States and Canada, signed on February 27, 1950, concerning the uses of waters of the Niagara River, all the waters of that river available for power purposes are divided equally between the two countries. In this respect, I consider that the situation was well put in a letter addressed to the Chairman of the Committee on Public Works of the House of Representatives on July 16, 1953, by Assistant Secretary of State Morton when he said "The change in the amount of water diverted at Chicago might affect the arrangements set forth in the Niagara Treaty".

The Canadian Government wishes to draw attention once more to the fact that the Chicago diversion is one aspect of a matter now before the International Joint Commission and it is suggested that it would be in the best interest of Canada and the United States to allow the Commission to complete its study of this and related matters before any change in arrangements affecting the levels of the Great Lakes is authorized. Text Ends.

CHICAGO DIVERSION

As you know, two notes have been recently addressed to the State Department concerning legislation now before the Congress relating to the Chicago diversion. Both notes are in the nature of preliminary statements of the views of the Canadian Government and they leave the way open for a formal objection at the appropriate time. The second note, in fact, suggests that such an objection is contemplated.

The right of either government to object to an interference with or diversion of waters on the other's side of the boundary, which would be productive of material injury to navigation, is expressly reserved in Article II of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. An objection, however, would only be appropriate when it became clear that the objectionable act was about to take place. This matter was considered at a recent meeting between officials of the Departments of the Canadian Government concerned, as it appears that the measure before Congress can be expected to be considered by the Senate in the near future. (The measure was passed by the House of Representatives on February 4, 1954, by an unrecorded vote after a vote to recommit the bill to Committee was defeated by 234 to 150).

Although the Senate may be expected to give more weight to the views of the several States opposing the measure, it would appear that Canada can no longer rely on opposition in the United States to forestall any increase in the Chicago diversion. At the meeting referred to, it was decided to recommend that a formal objection be addressed to the United States Government at the appropriate time. It was considered that the most appropriate time to lodge such a protest would be immediately after the legislation is passed by the Senate. To be effective, on the other hand, the objection should be available to put before the President when he is considering whether or not he should sign the proposed legislation. A note in this sense has been drafted and cleared by the Legal Division of the Department. The draft incorporates suggestions made by the Ambassador in Washington and it has been approved by the Ministers of Transport, Public Works and Northern Affairs and National Resources. A copy of the draft is attached. If you approve, this draft note will be sent to the Ambassador in Washington for use in addressing a note of protest to the State Department immediately if the Senate approves legislation authorizing an increase in the Chicago diversion.¹⁸¹

Sir:

On instructions of my Government, I should like to draw attention to my Notes No. 79A of February 1, 1954, and No. 169 of March 10, 1954, concerning Bill H. R. 3300, approved by the House of Representatives on February 4, 1954, which would authorize an increase in the diversion of water from Lake Michigan through the Chicago Drainage Canal. It is noted that this measure has now been approved by the Senate.

As mentioned in my previous two notes, the Canadian Government considers that the adoption of this measure would have an adverse effect on navigation in the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River. After careful consideration the Government of Canada has reached the conclusion that an increase in the diversion at Chicago by 1,000 cubic feet per second as provided in this legislation would in fact result in injury to navigation in boundary waters, particularly during cycles of low levels on the Great Lakes.

It is the view of my Government, therefore that the implementation of this proposed legislation would constitute a diversion of waters on the United States side of the boundary, the effect of which will be productive of material injury to the navigation interests on the Canadian side of the boundary. In these circumstances and in accordance with the right which is expressly reserved in Article II of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, I am instructed by my Government to make formal objection to the proposed increase in the diversion of the waters of Lake Michigan and to request that the United States Government take whatever measures may be appropriate to ensure that this proposal is not implemented. In this connection it is suggested that the interests of Canada and the United States would best be served by allowing the International Joint Commission to complete its study of this and related matters under the arrangements already agreed upon in the joint reference of June 25, 1952.

Accept, Sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

CHICAGO DIVERSION¹⁸³

Yesterday I, accompanied by Taylor, delivered to Andrew Foster, Acting Director of the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs at the State Department, our note No. 550 of August 24, concerning the Chicago diversion. The text of the note was identical with the draft note attached to your X-495. Horsey, Wight, and Nugent were also present.

2. In our oral remarks we said we hoped that the views outlined in our note would be made known to the appropriate officials of the United States Government before the bill was signed by the President. We took the opportunity to emphasize that the Canadian Government was protesting formally against the proposed increased diversion because of the adverse effects it would have for navigation interests on the Canadian side of the boundary in the Great Lakes and on the St. Lawrence river. We stressed also the detrimental effect that the proposed increased diversion would have on the power development in the St. Lawrence power project and at Niagara Falls, and emphasized also that the proposed increased diversion might affect the arrangements agreed on in the Niagara Treaty of February, 1950. We pointed out in reply to a question by Horsey that the adverse effects foreseen by Canada would be detrimental to United States interests as well, and that, in the opinion of the Canadian Government, the interests of both countries would be served best if no action to increase the diversion at Chicago were taken until after the IJC had completed its studies under the 1952 Lake Ontario reference.

3. Foster undertook to communicate the views outlined in our note to the appropriate officials as soon as possible. Neither Foster nor Horsey seemed to be too clear on precisely what the next step would be and there was some doubt in their minds whether other interested departments would have to be consulted before the State Department's views were sent to the President's advisers. On this point, however, Vallance, to whom we spoke both before and after presenting the note, said that the State Department's views, together with our note, would be sent to the Bureau of the Budget. Vallance, who is probably more familiar with the Chicago diversion than anyone else in the State Department, told us he had drafted a letter to the Budget Bureau which contained a recommendation for a Presidential veto. He was unable to foretell, however, whether or not the letter in its present form was likely to be signed. We should tell you also that after the meeting with Foster, Wight told us that the State Department had hoped the bill would die in the Senate so that the question whether or not to recommend veto action would not have to be faced.

The Senate passed its version of H.R. 3300 on August 23, 1954.

4. On balance, we think there is probably some chance that veto action may be recommended, but we are not hopeful that the President will in fact, veto the bill.

5. During the discussion Horsey made the somewhat curious suggestion that there might be some ambiguity in the final sentence of the second last paragraph of our note. Horsey thought that the word "this" in the phrase "to complete its study of this and related matters" might be interpreted to mean that the IJC was studying either (a) the merits and demerits of the Chicago diversion itself, or, (b) the terms of Bill HR-3300. We said in reply that the word "this" referred clearly to the "proposed increase in the diversion of the waters of Lake Michigan" and suggested that there was little room for either of his interpretations if the whole of the relevant paragraph were read in context. Despite our attempts to dissuade him, Horsey remained mildly persistent and we agreed to call your attention to his suggestion.

6. Although the reasons and motive for Horsey's concern were not entirely clear to us, it was evident from the discussion that he was concerned partly at least with the important question of IJC jurisdiction. (You will recall that in our letter 1381 we reported that the question of IJC jurisdiction over the Chicago diversion had been raised by Vallance). Although we consider both of Horsey's interpretations to be quite incorrect, we could not help but wonder why his point had not been made earlier, especially as notes 169 of March 10 and 79A of February 1, 1954, had contained wording identical with that to which Horsey directed our attention in the current note. It would seem, especially in view of the speed with which he focussed attention on this wording, that previous thought had been given to his point in the State Department. In these circumstances we should be most grateful to receive your comments as soon as possible.

7. In confirmation of yesterday's telephone call between Freifeld and Taylor, it has been agreed with the State Department that during the period in which Presidential action is being considered, it would be advantageous for us not to publicize the fact that we have made further representations to the State Department on this question. We should be grateful for your instructions concerning the publicity to be given to our latest note if the President should sign or veto the bill.

8. A copy of the note we delivered is going forward by bag.

CHICAGO DIVERSION

The Embassy in Washington informed us today that there was at least an even chance that the President will sign the Chicago Diversion Bill, and that he may do so imminently. While this Bill would authorize only a limited increase in the present rate of diversion, its passage would mark the first time that the Supreme Court Order of 1930 will have been broken. On the other hand, if the President vetoes the Bill its proponents will require a considerable time to put it forward again. In the intervening period the power development in the St. Lawrence River will have proceeded and strong opposition to the diversion can be expected from the State of New York.

2. While our Note, registering formal objection, has already been presented to the State Department, you may consider it advisable to have additional oral representations made. Mr. Heeney is away from Washington at the present time and, in this situation, representations by the Chargé might not have equal impact. You might, therefore, wish to consider the advisability of telephoning to Mr. Robert Anderson, explaining to him the serious effect which signature of the Bill would have at the present time on Canadian public reaction to the Seaway agreement just signed. (Increased diversion will also have an important technical effect on the power and navigation project, which you would presumably not wish to expound to Mr. Anderson on the telephone; there is no reason to think that Mr. Anderson is familiar with the details of Chicago Diversion). You might wish to urge him to use his influence with the President (who is in Denver for some weeks) in this regard.

3. I am attaching for your information the latest message from the Embassy, providing the information that has been obtained on the likelihood of signature or veto.¹⁸⁴

CHICAGO DIVERSION BILL

Following from Under-Secretary, Begins: The Minister asked Bliss to call at noon today and impressed two points on him:

(1) That we are anxious that our representations be considered by the President before he decides whether or not to sign the Bill. Bliss said that he was sure that either the text of your note or the substance of it had been sent "to the White House" yesterday. Although we did not press Bliss further, I am afraid that his answer does not necessarily mean that your note has been brought to the personal attention of the President, who is in Denver. Can you try to get a better answer — surely we have a right to ask that the President be shown our formal representations before he makes a decision. I leave it to your discretion to decide how best to press this at a high level.

(2) That, apart from all other Canadian objections to the Bill, the timing could not be worse in relation to the Seaway agreement signed last week.¹⁸⁵ The Canadian Government is being severely criticized by many people for "selling out" to the United States on the Seaway. We can answer such unjust criticisms but our task will be made almost impossible if, at this time, the Chicago Diversion Bill is enacted into law. Even if there were no engineering connection (which there is) between the Diversion and the Seaway and Power Project, the political connection is clear. I think that you should also make this point at once to the State Department.

2. We will send another telegram† answering some points in your WA-1463. Ends.

CHICAGO DIVERSION BILL

Following for the Under-Secretary, Begins: Accompanied by Taylor, I went this afternoon to see Bonbright, who was the most senior State Department officer available. We drew Bonbright's attention to the text of the note we delivered on Tuesday and repeated the arguments outlined in it and the two previous notes.

2. We also brought up the two points dealt with in your telegram under reference:

(1) We were assured that the Canadian views would be put before the President before he made a decision. The regular procedure is that the Bureau of the Budget calls on the interested departments to submit their comments and a brief containing these is presented to the President. It is only when this brief is available that the President's staff would place the bill before him. In this case, the State Department was consulted and transmitted our views to the Bureau of the Budget. In the view of Bonbright and the other State Department officers present at our meeting, this afternoon, it is regarded as impossible that the President would be called upon to make a decision on the bill before the brief mentioned was in his hands.

(2) We explained to Bonbright the awkward situation created by the fact that the Chicago Diversion Bill has been passed by the Congress at just the time when the St. Lawrence seaway was most before the Canadian public, and indicated the unfortunate impressions which might be created if the bill were signed. Bonbright took note of these remarks.

3. The State Department have no information as to the stage which final action on the bill has now reached. Ends.

Washington, September 14, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL

CHICAGO DIVERSION

Attached are eight copies of the Memorandum of Disapproval of the Chicago Diversion bill, which was issued on the 3rd of September from the White House Office at Lowry Air Force Base in Denver.¹⁸⁶ We have only now received these documents. Presumably the reason for the delay has been the slowness with which comparatively routine documents pass back and forth between Denver and Washington.

2. After giving an outline of the bill in the opening paragraphs, President Eisenhower lists the following four reasons to explain why he is unable to approve the bill:

(a) Existing diversions are adequate for navigation on the Illinois waterway and Mississippi River.

(b) All methods of control of lake levels and protection of property on the Great Lakes should be considered before arbitrarily proceeding with the proposed increased diversion.

(c) The diversions are authorized without reference to negotiations with Canada.

(d) The legitimate interests of other States affected by the diversion may be adversely affected.

In commenting briefly on the third of the points listed above, the President notes the representations made by the Canadian Government when the bill was under consideration by Congress, and discloses that Canadian objections to the bill were repeated in a Note to the State Department dated the 24th of August, 1954. The President then expressed the view "that the additional diversion is not of such national importance as to justify action without regard to the views of Canada."

3. It should also be noticed that, in referring to the study now being made by the International Joint Commission of all the factors affecting the level of Lake Ontario, the President observes that, "reasonable opportunity to complete these surveys should be afforded before legislative action is undertaken." You will remember that we have reported on a number of occasions (most recently in our letter No. 1381 of the 28th of July, 1954)† that Mr. W.R. Vallance of the State Department has several times suggested that the International Joint Commission should hold a special public hearing to discuss the Chicago Diversion. He has repeated this suggestion to officers within the Embassy within the past ten days. Although his proposal for a special public hearing need not be regarded, we think, as representing an official State Department view, it is true that other, and more senior, officers in the State Department are anxious that there should be some definite progress to report to Congress early in its next session on the International Joint Commission's study of levels in Lake Ontario. In opposing the Chicago Diversion bill before the House Committee on Public Works at the last session, officials of the State Department emphasized that the Commission was the proper body to consider the Chicago Diversion in connection with the 1952 reference concerning the level of Lake Ontario. They are afraid that, if there is no marked progress to report to Congress at its next session, the pressure of Congressional opinion for increased diversion may become unmanageable. With that possibility in view, we were last week informed officially by Mr. Hayden Raynor, Director of the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs in the State Department, that the United States authorities hoped that the Canadian Government would do everything possible to expedite an early report by the International Joint Commission on water levels in Lake Ontario.

4. From papers left with us by Mr. E.A. Côté during his recent visit to Washington, we gather that the Board of Engineers appointed by the International Joint Commission to consider the Lake Ontario reference, may be in a position to make a report early in December of this year which would be sufficiently definite to warrant arrangements being made for public hearings by the Commission in January and February, 1955, so that a report by the Commission to the two governments could be submitted early next March. We wonder whether you would think it proper for us to inform the State Department of this tentative timetable?

OEEC REPORT ON THE RELAXATION OF QUANTITATIVE RESTRICTIONS
ON IMPORTS FROM THE DOLLAR AREA

You may recall that the last Ministerial Council instructed the Joint Trade and Intra-European Payments Committee to submit a report on the relaxation of QRs on imports from the dollar area to the Council not later than the first of October. Following this instruction, the Joint Committee drew up a questionnaire to Member countries to elicit information on the present levels of dollar restrictions. At the same time the Secretariat has made some effort to ascertain the degree of restrictiveness of the present controls on dollar trade and to provide some estimate of the effects on balance of payments of removing restrictions.

2. Unfortunately neither of these two avenues of approach have yielded very satisfactory information. With regard to the level of restrictions in each country, the Secretariat have endeavoured to ascribe a percentage of dollar trade on private account liberalized for each country. Apart from the well-known difficulties of choosing an appropriate base year and of ascertaining what trade would have taken place had there been no QRs, the additional difficulty that food products in some OEEC countries are subject to state trading has rendered the percentage figures almost meaningless.

3. With regard to the attempt to quantify the effects on balance of payments of liberalizing dollar imports, the results have been equally meagre. A Member of the Secretariat has attempted to compare the percentages of dollar and European imports in European countries for 1938 and 1949 and thereby draw some conclusion as to the effects of removing all QRs. There are, of course, many drawbacks to this sort of analysis and, in our opinion, it could not be used as a basis for decision.

4. The Working Party of the Joint Trade and Payments Committee met last week to discuss the best way of handling the factual sections of the report and to have a preliminary exchange of views on the recommendations to Member countries which might be suggested to the Council. Our view, which we expressed to the Working Party, is that the next Ministerial Council should make a general recommendation to Member Governments to remove all discrimination as quickly as possible. We feel that it would be better to concentrate on the removal of discrimination at this stage rather than of all QRs. There are several reasons for this:

(i) The removal of discrimination is a logical first step and will be more acceptable to European countries than an across-the-board recommendation.

(ii) With the advent of convertibility,¹ all discrimination (unless supported artificially), will tend to disappear. Thus it is important that steps be taken as quickly as possible to reduce the degree of restriction inherent in the dollar QRs so as to reduce the "shock" effect of the removal of discrimination when one or a few currencies are made convertible.

(iii) Products which are entering freely from other European countries might be liberalized vis-à-vis the dollar area more readily than those which are under quantitative restriction from Europe as well.

The Working Group was in general agreement with the view that the principle of non-discrimination should be established at the next Ministerial Council.

5. The terms of reference of the Working Group also require it "to submit concrete proposals to the Council on such action as the Organization might take in co-operation with the United States and Canada in connection with the removal of dollar restrictions".

6. A number of suggestions have been made:

1. The establishment of a common list;
2. The establishment of percentage liberalization targets;

3. The introduction of a procedure for periodic justification of dollar restrictions (i.e. a dollar "negative list" exercise).

7. There was little support at the Working Group for a common list. The Italian Delegate thought that a common list of dollar goods which might be freely traded in Europe might serve some purpose — but he did not envisage this as a comprehensive list intended to cover all liberalized products in any one country. None of the other representatives would accept the idea of a common list of any kind.

8. The possibility of establishing targets for liberalization or for the reduction of discrimination was considered more carefully. The United Kingdom is opposed to the establishment of targets. The reason given was that they consider it inappropriate that OEEC should propose to take on a commitment to countries outside the OEEC area. Another difficulty is that there is a great difference between the dollar-liberalized percentages of different countries and it would, in practice, be most difficult to find a target percentage which would provide a useful focus for future liberalization. It might well retard the advance of the stronger countries.

9. There was no real support for the establishment of targets except surprisingly enough, from the Americans (who were without formal instructions). The FOA representative felt that the establishment of targets might be useful, but he did not press his view. They do think that some sort of review mechanism should be established so that at periods of six months or a year the Organization could assess the implementation of the proposed Council resolution and study any particular problems preventing further progress. The Working Party were inclined to agree that some follow-up work would be useful, but that no specific targets should be set, nor was there much enthusiasm for the introduction of a procedure for periodic justification of restrictions.

10. The results of this first exchange of views seem to us to be entirely satisfactory. We feel that it would be wrong (and contrary to the principles of your instructions to date), to establish a common list or a common target percentage of liberalization. This approach may have some meaning within the OEEC area where there is a definite bargaining relationship between the various countries. Between the various OEEC countries and Canada and the U.S.A. there could be no such relationship. We would be establishing the paraphernalia of bargaining without any of its content! Accordingly we are most gratified that the members of the Working Group have not picked up this idea.

11. The most helpful line for OEEC to take, in our opinion, would be to relate the desirability of the removal of dollar discrimination to the probable, if not inevitable, economic effects of the introduction of convertibility — which imply that discrimination must end with convertibility. A forthright ministerial statement of principle on the desirability of removing discrimination as an essential step toward preparing the country economies for convertibility would be a useful keystone for future work. In addition, a periodic review of country efforts might prove useful.

12. There is one economic point which does not appear to have been fully recognized in OEEC circles in connection with dollar discrimination and convertibility. It has been generally accepted that dollar discrimination will break down quickly following a move to convertibility in Europe. It is usually assumed, however, that this refers only to the commodities which have been liberalized in Europe but not from the dollar area; i.e. it is agreed that goods liberalized within Europe will have also to be liberalized vis-à-vis the dollar area.

13. It is obvious, however, that in addition to the European free lists, the lists under quantitative restriction which are now being administered in a discriminatory manner will also, on the introduction of convertibility, be administered in a non-discriminatory manner. (i.e. If France has a global quota on refrigerators which at present permits the entry of a number of German refrigerators but no lower priced U.S. refrigerators, the effect of the convertibility of the German mark will be that French authorities will have no reason to insist that French holdings of German marks should be spent on high cost refrigerators rather than transferred into dollars to pay for low cost U.S. refrigerators). This may be a very important factor. It implies that the European countries should give careful consideration to the relaxation of discrimination within the lists of commodities under quantitative restriction if they are to avoid the shock effects of a large number of adjustments at the time convertibility is introduced.

14. We shall be writing to you again as soon as some further progress is made in the Working Group.

OEEC REPORT ON THE RELAXATION OF QUANTITATIVE RESTRICTIONS
ON IMPORTS FROM THE DOLLAR AREA

The Working Party is now putting the final polish on its Report which will be distributed early next week. We shall send you copies as soon as we receive them in order that you may send us comments in time for a meeting of the Joint Intra-European Trade and Payments Committee on October 11. This will not give you much time to comment but the Committee meeting cannot be postponed as the report is to be referred to the Deputies of the Ministerial Examination Group on Convertibility which meets on October 13.

2. As we indicated in our letter under reference, the statistical and analytical parts of the report are very weak and incomplete. However, the assessment of the effects of liberalizing QRs both ex post and ex ante is an extremely difficult task and, although the Working Party might have produced a technically improved report, it almost certainly could not have arrived at a much clearer assessment of what has taken place or what is likely to take place as dollar restrictions are liberalized.

3. The most important section of the report is Chapter 5 which contains the conclusions and recommendations. They will contain the following points:

(i) A proposal that the next Ministerial Council should agree to a resolution inviting Member governments to continue their efforts, as circumstances permit, to relax the QRs which they apply to imports from the dollar area and at the same time to reduce progressively their discrimination vis-à-vis the dollar area.

(ii) A proposal that Member governments should agree to report to the Organization, without delay, all new measures which they may take concerning QRs applied to products from the dollar area and particularly all changes in the lists of products liberated vis-à-vis the dollar area.

(iii) A proposal that a general examination of the situation concerning dollar import liberalization should be undertaken at intervals (perhaps every six months) by OEEC with the collaboration of the United States and Canada and that a report be drawn up periodically on the progress achieved and the conditions encountered. There was full agreement on these three points in the Working Group. The United States Representative, however, has been pressing for a more explicit description of the examinations which might be carried out in future by the Joint Trade and Payments Committee. The United States apparently has in mind a type of "negative list" exercise by which countries would be requested to submit to the Organization statements of action taken on dollar liberalization, the progress they believe can be achieved and the obstacles to further liberalization with which they are faced.

4. We have not supported the United States Delegation in this request for an examination which would require justifications from Member countries of their dollar restrictions. The only justification they could give would be a balance of payments justification, otherwise they would find themselves in trouble with GATT or, on the other hand, we might find ourselves in an embarrassing situation. Secondly, the main useful purpose served by the negative list exercise is that it provides a basis for reciprocal action in the removal of intra-European QRs. We had felt that if we pressed for a full negative list exercise, that the Europeans might wish for some reciprocal action on the part of the dollar countries and this is precisely what happened.

5. The Norwegian Delegation proposed that the following paragraph should be inserted in the conclusion:

"It was also suggested in the Working Party that, in order to insure a more complete analysis of the situation and a closer co-operation of the United States and Canada in the work of the Organization on dollar restrictions, a recommendation be made to the associate members that they also submit statements on the measures that have been taken by them to insure a more liberal access to their markets".

The European countries immediately picked up the Norwegian suggestion and the United States Representative was able to inform the last meeting of the Working Party that Washington's first reactions to the suggestion were favourable.

6. Although recognizing the psychological advantages (which are emphasized by the Americans in Paris), we have opposed the Norwegian suggestion in the context of the Organization's work on dollar import restrictions. We have said that in principle, though without commitment to you, we could see no objection and perhaps some useful purpose in providing statements from Canada and the United States on what we are doing to insure a more liberal access to our markets in connection with the general move to a wider system of trade and payments. We felt that the Organization's studies on dollar import restrictions should be linked to dollar reserve and balance of payments positions and that the Working Party should not attempt to assess the influence of North American trade policy on the reserve and balance of payments positions. This was much too large a task for the Working Group and would place it far beyond its original mandate.² We had in mind, of course, the implication, which is certainly in the minds of the European countries, that there may be some possibility of relating relaxations of dollar import restrictions to relaxations in other forms of commercial policy in the United States and Canada. They are, of course, principally concerned with the United States. We have pointed out that there can be no question of accepting the principle of bargaining other forms of commercial policy including tariff relaxations against relaxations of dollar import restrictions.

7. As agreement could not be reached on this point, accordingly the Working Party decided to include in its conclusions a sentence to the effect that the suggestions put forward concerning the future examinations on dollar import restrictions, "raised questions of a political and a juridical nature". They, therefore, suggest that these considerations be given consideration when a new mandate is drawn up for the Committee. The discussion on the new mandate will probably not take place until after the next Ministerial meeting. However, we shall be obliged to comment on the suggestion at the Trade and Payments Committee meeting on the 11th and probably at the Deputies of the Ministerial Examination Group on October 13. We should be grateful, therefore, for your comments on the line we have taken and your instructions on how we should deal with the matter, before October 11.

8. We do not wish to underestimate the psychological advantages of providing short North American statements on measures taken to assure liberal access of European products to United States and Canadian markets. If the United States Government agrees to provide such statements for this purpose, we feel that Canada can hardly refuse to do likewise. Our full participation in an OEEC examination of this type, of course, makes our task very much easier in the Committees and Working Groups. On the other hand, we feel strongly that statements requested from Canada and the United States should be presented in connection with the general work of the Ministerial Examination Group on the move to convertibility and a wider system of trade and payments, and not solely in connection with the work on dollar import liberalization.

9. We are not, of course, in a position to comment on the reasons for Washington's favourable preliminary reaction to North American participation. It may be

² Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Agree [A.E. Ritchie]

that they have in mind only the psychological advantages of participation or, on the other hand, they may feel that an OEEC study linking the relaxation of European dollar restrictions in a general way to relaxations in U.S. commercial policy may serve to strengthen the Administration's hand in promoting more liberal policies in Congress.

RELAXATION OF QR'S

The U.S. initiative for more ambitious studies relating to the action taken on dollar liberalization might conceivably spring from a dissatisfaction over the selection by the European countries of the commodities liberalized. You will recall that the U.S. Embassy here recently raised this question with us. It may be that our lack of enthusiasm for a Canada-U.S. examination as to the adequacy of dollar liberalization measures has resulted in an attempt to explore this field under the aegis of the joint Trade and Payments Committee.

2. We agree that you should oppose any attempt by the Committee to study the influence of North American trade policies in relation to dollar import liberalization measures. Our attitude has, of course, been that a further relaxation of dollar import restrictions should, in the interests of European countries themselves, proceed as quickly as circumstances permit. And while it is evident that progress along these lines depends to some extent on the degree of "restrictiveness" in the trade and commercial policies of dollar countries, particularly the United States, we should resist any attempt, particularly in this narrower context, to bargain a relaxation of QR's against compensating action by dollar countries or to excuse inaction in dismantling QR's on the grounds of U.S. inaction in liberalizing its own trade policies. (This seems to be a possibility that the U.S. Delegation has overlooked.)

3. In our view, there is even a danger in linking studies on dollar import restrictions too closely with dollar reserve and balance of payments positions. Liberalization measures embarked upon by the European countries in their own interests should strengthen their own economic [sic] and thereby result in stronger reserve positions. You will recall that the U.K. moved forward when its own reserve position was far from satisfactory.

4. If it is the wish of other members, however, we would be prepared to submit a short statement in connection with the work of the Ministerial Examination Group on the measures taken to foster liberal access to Canadian markets.

RELAXATION OF DOLLAR QRS

At the joint trade and payments committee last week a sharp division of opinion arose over the recommendations contained in paragraphs 52, 53 and 54 of TP(54)14 concerning the procedure for future examinations of dollar QRS in OEEC. No agreement was possible; the question will be discussed again in the executive committee on November 2.

2. There is no difficulty over paragraph 52 which provides for a periodic report on progress achieved and difficulties encountered. With regard to paragraph 53 the United Kingdom, German, Norwegian and Benelux delegates stated that they could only agree to an examination of obstacles to further liberalization if the United States and Canada were prepared to accept the provisions of paragraph 54, viz. to submit periodic reports on measures that have been taken by them to ensure a more liberal access to their markets. The United Kingdom was doubtful whether they could accept an analysis of the more important commodity groups that remain under restriction in any circumstances.

3. We made a statement setting forth the views contained in your telegram No. 720 and in our statement to the deputies attached to our letter No. 3086.† As we were bound by your instructions to accept the provisions of paragraph 54 only in connection with the broad approach to convertibility and not directly linked with the liberalization of dollar QRS, we suggested that the debate should be resumed in the executive committee.

4. The United States delegation, under instructions from Washington, have been pressing strongly for a periodic comprehensive study of the non-liberalized sector and they are very concerned that our position will reduce the periodic reviews to "a mere stocktaking". Shearer of the United States delegation has talked to us privately urging on us the desirability of altering our stand.

5. We feel that the United States position is most unfortunate. By agreeing to discuss United States commercial policy in relation to the relaxation of QRS they have raised the possibility in the minds of the European delegations of establishing a bargaining situation. This may have already taken the focus off the desirability for the countries themselves of proceeding at their own best pace and may, in our view, result in the withholding of liberalization measures that might otherwise have been taken in the hope of getting United States concessions.

6. Shearer does not agree with our point of view. He insists that the United States delegation will make it quite clear that in submitting United States reports, there will be no question of bargaining dollar QRS against liberalization of North American commercial policy. He says that Washington considers it important that the OEEC countries should agree to discuss their problems and that it would have an unfortunate effect on Congress if it were known that they had refused to submit to examinations of the type proposed in paragraph 53. In order to make it easier for the European countries to accept these examinations, the United States are prepared to accept the risks involved of European attempts to bargain.

7. While we feel quite strongly that the United States approach is wrong, we nevertheless think that if they are prepared to discuss their commercial policy in the dollar liberalization forum it will be difficult for us to insist on our view. Paragraph 54 is of course aimed at the United States and not at us and so should not cause us any embarrassment.

8. Bearing in mind the United States view that the paragraph 53 proposals will be helpful to their administration in working for a more liberal commercial policy and the necessity of our accepting paragraph 54 if paragraph 53 is to be accepted, we would suggest that you give us more flexible instructions permitting us to accept paragraph 54.

9. If you cannot send us instructions before November 2 please let us know as soon as possible so that the consideration of the dollar import report can be postponed until a later meeting of the executive committee.

RELAXATION OF DOLLAR QR'S

This problem was discussed again interdepartmentally and our basic views remain as outlined in our telegram No. 720 of October 8. The question of dollar liberalization is one for the European countries to consider in the light of their own interests and in relation to their commitments under the GATT, the IMF and other international agreements. We do not, of course, regard action on dollar liberalization as dependent on, or related to, reductions in tariff barriers by dollar countries.

2. However, in the view of the apparent U.S. decision to participate in this study (and if there is a general desire to proceed along the lines of paragraphs 53 and 54), you may indicate that we would be prepared to provide information on conditions of access to the Canadian market while repeating the views expressed in paragraph above.

DOLLAR IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

The OEEC Report on the Relaxation of QRs on Imports from the Dollar Area (C(54)280) was submitted to the Economic Committee for comments last week before being forwarded to the Executive Committee.

2. At the Economic Committee there was a sharp division between the EPU creditors and debtors. The creditors wished the Economic Committee to pass on the report without comment. The debtors, led by the French, wished to include a paragraph in the comments which would alter the whole concept of how OEEC countries should proceed in the liberalization of their dollar imports.

3. The philosophy behind the Joint Trade and Payments report (C(54)280) is that countries should proceed individually at their own best pace toward dollar import liberalization. The French are now proposing that countries intending to liberalize their dollar imports should take into account the incidence of their action on intra-European trade and on the position of Member countries in EPU. Unfortunately, the creditor countries and the U.K. are not inclined to oppose this concept. First of all, they hold strongly to the principle of European co-operation on a regional basis; secondly the concept will in future provide a useful argument for not liberalizing dollar imports should they ever be in a position to need such an argument; thirdly, the U.K. Ministers have periodically, since they first made their proposals for a move toward convertibility, insisted that it was not their idea that convertibility should be achieved at the cost of a reduction of European trade.

4. We and the U.S. Representative opposed the French concept but were not successful in excluding it from the short comments of the Economic Committee

(C(54)288—six copies attached). Paragraph 3 of these comments states inter alia that:

The Economic Committee feels that it is in agreement with the trend of thought of the Joint Committee in underlining that, on the one hand, it is desirable that liberalization of intra-European trade should progress at the same time as liberalization of dollar imports, and that, on the other hand, it would be useful to invite Member countries to continue individually their efforts concerning liberalization of dollar imports, taking into account both their respective economic and financial situation, and the incidence of their action on intra-European trade and on the position of Member countries in EPU.

5. The United States and ourselves reserved our position on the last part of this paragraph. In making our reserve we made the following points:

6. We said that our reserve was one of emphasis and that we would agree that it was important that the reduction of dollar import restrictions should not have a disruptive effect on intra-European trade; that was why we had on previous occasions emphasized the importance of countries taking full advantage of the present favourable situation in Europe in order that the adjustments which would be required should take place gradually.

7. The French amendment, however, raised a question of principle. We felt that the OEEC countries should focus their attention on the desirability of acquiring the full advantages that would accrue to the OEEC area when it is integrated into a wider system. In order to enjoy the full advantages of a fully multilateral system, it might be necessary to accept some change in European trade patterns and some need for internal price adjustments. We said that it was our hope that these changes might take place gradually and in conjunction with a rising level of overall trade so that sharp internal adjustments might not prove necessary. In this context we agreed that Member countries should take account of the results of their dollar liberalization on other countries. We did not, however, share the view that the particular pattern of regional trade which had been built up under an area of restrictions should be maintained in all circumstances.

8. When the report is discussed in the Executive Committee and Council, the French Delegation is almost certain to insist that the ideas contained in para 3 are incorporated in the Council resolution. The best we and the Americans can probably hope for is that we may be able to modify it along the lines of our intervention. If you have any comments on these points, we should be glad to have them before November 18.

9. On the conclusions of C(54)280, there has been some additional discussion behind the scenes and there will be more before the next meeting of the Executive Committee when the report will be discussed on November 18. The U.S. Delegation under firm instructions from Washington, are pressing for the periodic examination of dollar import restrictions in OEEC including an analysis of the most important commodity groups that remain under restriction and of the obstacles to the removal of such restrictions. The U.K., up until recently, has objected to this approach but they are now apparently prepared to accept it. The continental countries on the other hand, which had sheltered behind the U.K. objections are now finding that they will have to fight the issue themselves. Their attack is along two lines:

(i) They will insist on associating a study of North American commercial policy with the examination of European dollar import liberalization;

(ii) They will probably follow the French proposal discussed above relating EPU trade and balance of payments positions to the dollar liberalization exercise.

10. Our assessment is that the U.S. insistence on detailed examination of obstacles to future dollar liberalization has tended to stimulate a co-operative resistance among the OEEC countries and the ultimate result may be to retard the progress toward liberalization rather than accelerate it for the reasons we have expressed in previous communications. The U.S. Delegation, however, are insisting that detailed examinations of the obstacles to future liberalization will be a useful element to place before Congress as a counterpart for the administration's proposals for a more liberal U.S. commercial policy. In this connection, they will suggest that C(54)280 be de-restricted so that it may be circulated in Washington.

11. Prior to the Executive Committee meeting on November 18, the U.S. Delegation will attempt to redraft para 54 of C(54)280 in order to provide for the examinations they desire and also to make it more acceptable to the OEEC countries. We do not feel that we need additional instructions for the November 18 meeting. We shall proceed in accordance with your telegram No. 819 of November 3.

DOLLAR IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

The OEEC report on the relaxation of QRs on imports from the dollar area (C(54)280) was considered at some length at the Executive Committee on November 23.

2. The French Representative, Mr. Wörmser, served warning that the French Government would reserve its position on the body of the report and could only accept the conclusions and any Council resolution arising out of the conclusions if they were modified to take account of French views. The main point at issue is that the French Government wishes the Council to agree that Member countries considering the further liberalization on dollar imports should take into account not only their respective economic and financial situation but also the incidence of their action on intra-European trade and the position of Member countries in EPU. The Italian Representative supported the French position but it did not receive any vocal support from any other quarter in the Executive Committee.

3. We and the U.S. objected strongly to the French intervention. We indicated that in principle it was contrary to principles which Member countries had accepted in the GATT and the Fund and consequently it was not proper that OEEC should inscribe this principle in its Council decisions. We also pointed out that in the move towards convertibility and the freeing of dollar trade, there was likely to be some alteration in European trade patterns. Such an alteration might be necessary if European countries were to derive the full advantage of the move towards a wider system of trade and payments. The German and Netherlands Representatives supported this point of view.

4. The Scandinavian Representatives (Norway and Sweden), while prepared to accept the report, placed emphasis on the close connection between work on dollar import liberalization and the examination of North American commercial policy. In their view the OEEC should study as a matter of first importance the future development of the dollar balance. The Scandinavians, supported strongly by the U.K., felt that that part of the future OEEC examinations of dollar import restrictions which relates to North American commercial policy was of prime importance. They intimated that future relaxations of dollar import restrictions depended on U.S. action to liberalize their commercial policy. The U.S. Representative indicated that this was not his Government's view and that there could be no question of bargaining dollar import restrictions in Europe against the freeing of U.S. commercial policy. The Scandinavians, however, are insisting that the examinations of North American commercial policy should be as stringent and comprehensive as the examinations of the dollar import policies of European countries. The U.S. Delegation are apparently prepared to accept this view and are prepared to discuss prospects as well as past achievements with regard to U.S. commercial policy in an OEEC forum.

5. The report got past the Executive Committee without any attempt being made to change its conclusions as amended by the U.S. proposals contained in C(54)288. There is no indication, however, that the French Representative will change his views at the Council and it is difficult to forecast what the outcome of the debate in that forum will be. The Council will consider the report on November 26.

DOLLAR IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

Following is the text of a draft Council recommendation concerning the relaxation of quantitative restrictions on imports from the dollar area. This recommendation was drawn up by a small working group on which we were not represented. It was circulated to delegations just prior to the Council discussion on December 3. Our following telegrams comment on the discussion and request instructions.

"CES/337

1 December 1954

The Council

Having regard to the resolution of the Council of the 6th May, 1954, concerning the relaxation of quantitative restrictions on imports from the dollar area (C(54)130);

Considering the report of the Joint Trade and Intra-European Payments Committee of 25th October, 1954, on the relaxation of quantitative restrictions on imports from the dollar area (C(54)280), the comments of the Economic Committee thereon (C(54)288), and the proposals submitted by the United States delegation (C(54)299);

Considering that it is in the interest of member countries to the extent that circumstances permit and taking due account of the objectives of European economic co-operation, to make further efforts to reduce quantitative restrictions on imports of goods (and restrictions on payments for services) from the United States and Canada and from non-member countries of the organization with a view to achieving a sound and balanced multilateral trading system on a world-wide basis;

Considering, however, that such progress should not endanger the results already achieved in the liberalization of intra-European trade and payments;

Recognizing that the speed with which further (sustained) progress in the removal of restrictions on imports from the dollar area can be achieved depends also upon action taken by countries in that area to reduce barriers to trade; desirous, therefore to ensure close co-operation with the United States and Canada in this matter;

I. Recommends

1. Member countries should continue individually their efforts to reduce, each to the extent that its economic and financial situation permits and taking into account the objectives of European economic cooperation, quantitative restrictions on imports of goods (and restrictions of payments for services) from the United States and Canada.

2. The associated countries should:

(a) likewise continue their efforts to ensure a more liberal policy in their trade relations with member countries, thereby facilitating the efforts of member countries to relax their quantitative restrictions on imports from the United States and Canada; and

(b) Keep the organization regularly informed of measures which they have taken in this field and of their programmes and policies for further progress.

II. Decides

3. Member countries shall inform the organization of any new measures which they take regarding the quantitative restrictions of imports of goods (and restrictions on payments for services) from the United States and Canada and, in particular, of any change in the lists of goods which may be imported without restriction from those countries.

4. (a) The organization shall undertake, from time to time, an examination of the problem of such restrictions vis-à-vis the United States and Canada so that a report thereon may be made to the Council;

(b) The examination shall include:

(i) a study of the progress achieved by each member country in the removal of such restrictions vis-à-vis the United States and Canada and of the difficulties encountered in their removal, the effects thereof, and the obstacles to further (sustained) progress;

(ii) a study, to the fullest extent possible, of the effects of such liberalization (on intra-European trade and) on the trade and payments position of member countries with the United States and Canada as well as with the E.P.U. area;

(iii) a study, with the framework of the general situation, of the effects of action taken by associated countries; and

(iv) an analysis, on the basis of these studies, of the extent to which further liberalization of imports from the United States and Canada is possible.

(c) In the conduct of these studies and analysis, the considerations affecting each of the three main groups of commodities, — i.e., food and feeding stuffs, raw materials, and manufactured goods — should be presented to the fullest extent possible.

5.(a) The Executive Committee shall decide which body of the organization shall undertake the examination provided for in paragraph 4 and shall arrange that a report on the results of the first examination shall be submitted to the Council not later than 30th June, 1955.

(b) The Joint Trade and Intra-European Payments Committee shall, in due course, propose to the Council a questionnaire which should be sent to member countries in order to provide material for the examination referred to in paragraph 4. In drawing it up, the committee may take into consideration the suggestions made by the United States delegation in Annex B to Document C(54)299. (It is, however, to be understood that no country will be asked to justify the maintenance of quantitative restrictions in respect of any individual commodity.)”

DOLLAR IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

Following are the texts of two draft Council resolutions which we proposed at the OEEC Council on December 3 as alternatives to the draft resolution contained in our immediately preceding telegram.

The Council

Having regard to the resolution of the Council of the 6th May, 1954, concerning the relaxation of quantitative restrictions on imports from the dollar area;

Considering the report of the Joint Trade and Intra-European Payments Committee of 25th October 1954, on the relaxation of quantitative restrictions on imports from the dollar area C(54)280, the comments of the Economic Committee thereon C(54)288;

Considering that it is in the interest of member countries, to the extent that circumstances permit, to make further efforts to reduce quantitative restrictions on imports of goods and to end restrictions on payments for services from the United States and Canada and from non-member countries of the organization with a view to achieving a sound and balanced multilateral trading system on a world-wide basis.

Recommends member countries should continue individually their efforts to reduce, each to the extent that its economic and financial situation permits, quantitative restrictions on imports of goods and restriction on payments for services from the United States and Canada and from non-member countries of the organization.

Decides member countries shall inform the organization of any new measures which they take regarding quantitative restrictions of imports of goods and restrictions on payments for services from the United States and Canada and non-member countries of the organization and, in particular, of any changes in the lists of goods which may be imported without restriction from those countries.

The organization shall undertake, from time to time an examination of the problem of such restrictions vis-à-vis the United States and Canada and other non-member countries so that a report thereon may be made to Council."

2nd December 1954.

The Council

Recognizing that the speed at which member countries can move toward non-discrimination vis-à-vis non-member countries depends on developments in their own balance of payments situation and upon action taken by countries in the dollar area.

Recognizing that practical progress toward the elimination of discrimination vis-à-vis non-member countries is an essential preparatory step to the move toward a wider convertible system of trade and payments.

Decides that the organization shall keep under review development in the commercial policies of the associated countries and to this end shall request periodic reports on actions which they have taken to reduce barriers to trade."

DOLLAR IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

The OEEC Council considered the report on dollar import restrictions on November 26 and again on December 3. At the meeting of November 26 little progress was made in arriving at a basis of agreement on a resolution. Indeed the debate ranged over a wide area in which most of the principles which had previously been agreed upon were thrown again into the melting pot.

2. The Swiss delegate made a very damaging statement in which he indicated disagreement with the main lines of C(54)280 (although the Swiss representatives at the working party had accepted it). The Swiss representative was motivated by the annoyance of his government over the treatment of the Swiss watch case by the United States Government.³ He suggested that no decision be taken, that the report

³ Le 27 juillet 1954, l'Administration des États-Unis a majoré les droits sur les importations de montres suisses pour protéger son industrie de l'horlogerie nationale.

On July 27, 1954, the United States administration increased the tariff on imported Swiss watches to protect its domestic watch-making industry.

be sent back for further consideration of the advantages of a concerted regional approach to the problem.

3. The French representation supported this suggestion as did the Italians and the Norwegians. We made a strong statement along the lines of your instructions.

4. The main point at issue, apart from the question of (groups corrupt) as opposed to an individual country approach to dollar liberalization, is the underlying question of reciprocity and the linking of United States commercial policy liberalization with progress in Europe. The United States delegate has committed his government (under specific instructions from Washington) to the association of an examination of United States commercial policy in conjunction with the examination of dollar QR's. He has insisted that there can be no question of bargaining the removal of dollar QR's against changes in United States commercial policy but they are (prepared?) to discuss their problems in order to secure a thorough examination of European QR's and dollar products. The European countries appear to welcome the opportunity to associate a consideration of United States commercial policy with dollar liberalization and there is no doubt that they are hoping that some possibilities for reciprocity will develop. As a first step they are insisting that there should be as detailed an examination of commercial policy in the associated countries as there is of dollar restrictions in Europe. None of the European countries, with the exception of Switzerland, is prepared to provide justifications for QR's which are being maintained (this is what the United States has been seeking). Switzerland, with almost no restrictions on dollar goods, wishes to have a procedure for justification in order that they may request the United States to justify its actions on Swiss watches and other products.

5. The Council on November 26 formed a small ad hoc group on which we were not included to draft a resolution. This resolution was circulated just prior to the Council meeting on December 3. The text is contained in our immediately preceding telegram.

6. In our view the draft resolution prepared by the group has many unfortunate aspects which are not in accordance with your previous comments and instructions. It provides for quite extensive examination of United States and Canadian commercial policy. In the last paragraph of the preamble, it recognizes that the speed with which further sustained progress in the removal of restrictions on imports from the dollar area can be achieved depends also upon action taken by countries in that area to reduce barriers to trade. It is almost impossible to disagree with this sentence as it formed part of the highly negotiated statement of principles of the ministerial examination group last June GMC(54)6. We are reporting separately on other points in the draft and the country positions taken on them yesterday.

7. After examining the draft prior to the Council on December 3, and bearing in mind the possibility that many parts of it might not prove generally acceptable, we decided to prepare alternative draft decisions more in line with our views. Our principal aim was to (1) separate the examination of associated countries' commercial policy from the dollar liberalization exercise and so reduce the risk of demands for reciprocity (2) restrict the dollar exercise and remove any suggestion of negative list justifications. The two draft Canadian proposals are contained in our immediately preceding telegram.

8. At yesterday's meeting we put these two proposals before the Council. The chairman, with whom we had discussed them previously, felt however that he would have to allow the Council to consider the working group's proposals first and as the entire meeting was taken up with this discussion, our proposals will not be considered until December 10. From our immediately preceding telegram which gives a detailed account of the discussion, you will see that there is a large measure of support for the working group's draft. This of course will make it very difficult to reopen discussion on our proposed texts should that be your wish.

9. The United States delegation is under strict instructions from Washington to press for the acceptance of the working group's draft. They recognize fully the risks they are running in associating the North American and European questions, but they are evidently much more concerned about getting a full discussion of European difficulties. The United States delegation, although it has failed in its efforts to secure an examination requiring justifications intends nevertheless to promote a full exchange of views on reasons for not eliminating QR's. This of course does not appear in the texts. In our view the more pressure the United States exerts on the European countries the more these countries will tend to press for reciprocal action from the United States. Indeed the European countries will probably welcome the chance to put the United States in the witness box.

10. The way things are moving seems to us unfortunate. If the working group draft is accepted European countries, we feel, will be inclined to consider not only their own financial situations when undertaking further relaxation of dollar restrictions, but also their bargaining position vis-à-vis the United States. This may retard the move toward non-discrimination which has been proceeding well up to now and may have unfortunate consequences on the timing of the move to convertibility.

11. We should like to emphasize that the Europeans at the moment have no designs on Canada and there is a general recognition of our liberal import policies. The United States delegation has told us privately that they are unlikely to agree to discuss their commercial policy if we refuse. Thus our refusal to accept the working group proposal might prevent it from being accepted by Council. Such a refusal on our part would however, subject us to the strongest criticism from all sides including the United States.

12. We should be grateful for your instructions on this matter as soon as possible as the Chairman will wish to have private discussions with us prior to the next Council on December 10. At any event, we will have to have instructions by that date. Please send us detailed comments on the texts as well as your instructions and views on the handling of the subject in Council.

DOLLAR IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

In accordance with the suggestion made to us over the telephone by Ritchie, we called this afternoon on Barnett and Boochever in the Office of European Regional Affairs in the State Department to explore the United States attitude towards the draft resolution on "relaxation of quantitative restrictions on imports from the dollars area," which is at present before the OEEC Council. Barnett and Boochever are the officers responsible for issuing instructions to the United States delegation on this subject.

2. We were assured that there has been no change in the United States position and that, in particular, the United States Government does not accept the principle that the speed at which quantitative restrictions on imports from the dollar area can be reduced depends upon a further liberalization of United States commercial policy. When the draft prepared by the working group was received in Washington, concern was at once expressed in a number of quarters over the insertion of this unacceptable principle. Officers in the State Department responsible for commercial policy were especially anxious that the offending sentence should either be amended or removed. After consultation both inside the State Department and with other agencies, including FOA, the United States Delegation to OEEC was instructed to try to have the relevant sentence amended so that it would state merely that the removal of dollar import restrictions "would be facilitated by" the removal by the United States of obstacles to trade. A reply soon came back to the effect that it would be difficult to have such a change made in the light of the fact that a sentence very similar to that contained in the working group's draft had been included in the statement of principles formulated by the ministerial examination group last June. The State Department reluctantly decided not to quarrel with that rejoinder. But they issued fresh instructions that their representative on the Council should make a statement explaining that, in the view of the United States Government, individual OEEC countries should reduce their quantitative restrictions on dollar imports as quickly as their balance of payments and the level of their reserves warranted, and that these were the only two relevant criteria. The United States representative was also instructed to seek the approval of the Council for this interpretation. It was not known in the State Department this afternoon whether such a statement had in fact been made at the meeting of the Council on the 3rd of December. But Barnett said that they would send a telegram at once to enquire whether the instructions had been carried out.

3. The State Department officials to whom we spoke regretted that events in OEEC had been allowed to develop in such a way as to create a situation in which it might be difficult to amend the resolution entirely to our satisfaction. But they were not disposed to let the issue go by default and said that they would welcome Canadian cooperation. They were disturbed by the possibility that the Canadian representative might refuse to accept the resolution and expressed the hope that the United States and Canada would be able to keep in step on this issue. Barnett said that if we could let him know as quickly as possible the conclusions reached at the interdepartmental meeting being held in Ottawa this afternoon, they would give our views immediate and sympathetic consideration, and would be glad to try to concert with us a common approach to this problem. If you decide to take up this offer, it would be helpful if you could provide us by teletype with the draft resolution prepared by the working group and also with the drafts prepared by our delegation to OEEC.

Following are our tentative views subject to confirmation late Thursday. In the meantime you might like to use this telegram as a basis for discussion.

1. We appreciate your constructive effort to adapt the draft Council resolution so as to make it less unpalatable. We would find it difficult, however, to support your re-draft in its entirety and we have ourselves given some thought to the manner in which the original draft might be modified in order to make it acceptable. We indicate below the respects in which we feel it should be changed.

2. While we do not underestimate the difficulty of securing acceptance of a re-draft of the kind we have in mind, we would not find it possible to support the resolution unless the preamble, and the subsequent reference back to it in recommendation (1), were modified substantially in the manner indicated. We also attach considerable importance to the elimination of the word "more" in paragraph I (2) (a).

3. We would not be prepared to accept a resolution which would modify the international obligations of the European countries merely to avoid affecting intra-European trade, or which, in effect, made the improvement of the commercial policies of the dollar countries a quid pro quo for relaxation of the dollar import restrictions which the European countries should undertake in any event.

4. If our unwillingness to go along with the resolution would result in it not being passed we would not be greatly troubled because we doubt that the resolution would be likely to have any very beneficial effects. Almost certainly, if it were passed in its original form, it would not result in benefits which would outweigh the unfortunate consequences which it might have for the GATT and for any representations which we make to individual European countries.

5. The following are the changes which we feel should be made in the draft resolution:

(a) The last three paragraphs of the preamble should be replaced substantially as follows: "Considering that it is in the interests of member countries to abolish discrimination in international trade as quickly as the state of their reserves and their balance-of-payments prospects permit, and that many member countries have entered into international obligations to do so through their membership in the GATT and in the IMF; Considering that the objectives of European economic cooperation, to which members re-affirm their attachment, include the achievement of a sound and balanced multilateral trading system on a world-wide basis; Recognizing that the reserve and balance-of-payments position of member countries, and their consequent capacity to remove restrictions on imports from the dollar area, will be affected by the action taken by countries in that area to provide opportunities to foreign countries to earn dollars." (You will note that the first consideration as far as the word "permit" is in accordance with paragraph 46 of Document C (54) 280.)

(b) Paragraph I (1) might simply read "Member countries, taking into account the foregoing considerations, should continue individually their efforts to reduce quantitative restrictions on imports of goods (and restrictions on payments for services) from the United States and Canada.

(c) The word "more" should be deleted from paragraph I (2) (a).

(d) In paragraph II (4) (b) (ii) the words "on intra-European trade and" seem redundant and should be deleted although we would not insist on this. We regard the whole of II (4) as providing only for studies and examinations and would not consider that any policy implications inconsistent with the preamble should be read into the fact that studies of the kind described were being undertaken. In connection with II (4) (a) in particular, the studies would be useful, but we would not expect their results to be regarded as binding, since these are matters which are covered by international agreements such as the GATT, and we would not expect the OEEC to attempt to take the place of the GATT in determining whether further liberalization was possible or appropriate.

(e) With respect to the last sentence of paragraph II (5) (b) we do not feel we should adopt a position, since this matter appears to be of more concern to other countries than to us.

DOLLAR IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

This afternoon at the State Department, we discussed this matter again with Barnett and Boochever of the Office of European Regional Affairs. Also present was Murray Ryss of the Commercial Policy Staff, who has been representing the State Department on a small inter-agency committee under FOA Chairmanship that has been considering dollar import restrictions.

2. We had had typed out the re-draft you had suggested to replace the preamble of the draft resolution prepared by the working group and the first paragraph of recommendations. After examining your draft, the State Department officials told us that it seemed to them to meet very well the points that had been causing worry in Washington as well as in Ottawa; and they would have been glad to support it if it had come a week earlier. However, they said that they could see no hope of persuading the OEEC Council to agree to such an extensive revision of the working group's draft as acceptance of your proposals would entail. They themselves have reluctantly come to the conclusion that it is now too late to obtain a wholly acceptable resolution and believe that our joint efforts should be directed instead to seeking approval of an interpretation which, if accepted, would leave the total record in not too unsatisfactory a state.

3. The core of the interpretation they have in mind would state "that nothing in this resolution conflicts with the principle that the basic criteria for dollar liberalization are balance of payments considerations and the level of reserves and that this principle is in accord with the obligations recognized by many members of the OEEC as signatories to the articles of agreement of the International Monetary Fund and as contracting parties to the general agreement on tariffs and trade". They intend to instruct the United States representative on the Council to try to obtain unanimous agreement for this interpretation for the moment. This move has not been cleared with other agencies and has the status only of a State Department proposal. It is expected that inter-agency approval for it will be secured this afternoon.

4. State Department officials hope that if our delegation to OEEC finds it impossible to obtain substantial support for the re-draft you have proposed, you will give them latitude to rally to the expedient they have in mind. They have undertaken to send a telegram this afternoon to their delegation to inform them that the new Canadian draft would be satisfactory from the United States point of view. But they could not undertake to instruct their delegation to support our new draft, since United States representatives in Paris have been too involved in the preparation of the working group's resolution to assist in seeking approval for extensive revision. They also admitted that they have felt obliged to give weight to the argument constantly advanced by the United States delegation on the spot that any attempt to drastically revise the draft resolution would be damaging to comity within the OEEC.

5. Finally, they said that they hoped we would not find it necessary to vote against the resolution. For their own part, they would not be prepared to scuttle it even to safeguard the principle embodied in their proposed interpretation statement, to which they, too, attach great importance.

DOLLAR IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

This message is to confirm the instructions contained in our earlier telegram. You should accordingly press for a redraft of the resolution on the lines which we have proposed. In that connection you might note incidentally that our version of the preamble is much closer than the original draft resolution to the views expressed in the report of the Joint Trade and Payments Committee.

2. If a revision containing the substance of our redraft is not acceptable to others you should indicate that you are unable to support the resolution.

3. Suggestions may be made (and we understand that the United States Delegation may make such a proposal) that the resolution be passed in its present form but accompanied by a statement in the record that nothing in the resolution is to be interpreted as conflicting with the principle that the basic criteria for dollar liberalization are the balance of payments position and the level of reserves. In that event you should say that you will of course refer this proposal to Ottawa. You should indicate however that the inclusion of any such declaration in the record would not make it possible for you to accept the resolution unchanged. You might explain that while apparently the objective of this interpretative statement is similar to that which we had in mind in our redrafting, it would seem quite unsatisfactory (and contradictory) merely to insert such a declaration in the Minutes while leaving the resolution itself in its present terms.

4. The result of all this may be that the resolution will pass with Canada in effect abstaining. If so we see no alternative to reconciling ourselves to such a situation since we are not prepared to participate in the sacrificing of the important principles involved.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

Repeat London No. 177; Washington No. 77.

The Council which was to have met on December 10, was postponed until December 21 in order to give the Chairman further time to secure agreement on the draft resolution CES/337. Yesterday Ellis-Rees and Lintott asked to see a member of the delegation to discuss our proposed amendments (your telegram No. 958).

2. In their view there is no chance that member countries will agree to our amendments. With regard to the preamble, the penultimate para of CES/337: "considering that such progress should not endanger the results already achieved in the liberalization of intra-European trade and payments" is a minimum condition for European countries. You will recall that they were anxious to get agreement that member countries considering the further relaxation of dollar import restrictions should take into account the effect of such relaxations on other member countries' EPU positions. This idea was watered down in the drafting group to the phrase: "taking due account of the objectives of European economic co-operation" in the third last paragraph.

3. In the last paragraph the wording to which we object, i.e. "recognizing that the speed with which further progress in the removal of restrictions on imports from the dollar area can be achieved depends also upon action taken by countries in that area to reduce barriers to trade..." is taken in substance from the Minister's statement of agreement on trade questions last July GMC(54)6, para. 4. It is therefore unlikely that any countries will agree to our amendment particularly when some countries, including the United Kingdom, consider that the most valuable parts of future studies will be those involving examinations of United States commercial policy.

4. Neither are the European countries, however much we may deplore the fact, likely to welcome your reference to their GATT and IMF obligations in the third last paragraph of your amendments to the preamble.

5. With regard to paragraph I(1), Ellis-Rees said that the working group draft contained carefully negotiated wording and member countries were likely to insist on retaining the words "economic" and "taking into account the objectives of European economic co-operation". Accordingly they are unlikely to accept our draft. They might agree to delete the word "more" in paragraph I (2a) although this is uncertain.

6. Thus, if we maintain our position and insist on our amendments, Ellis-Rees and Lintott consider that the resolution cannot be passed. We agree that this is almost certain to be the case. Although legally all OEEC resolutions can be passed without the consent of the associated countries, this resolution in its present form, in practice, could not be, as it involves the co-operation of the associated countries. If we do not agree to it the United States are also, we understand, unlikely to agree. Sir Hugh [Ellis-Rees] has not given much thought to possible alternatives. One possibility is that all study of dollar restrictions might be dropped. This, he thinks, would be unfortunate since the subject is so closely allied to convertibility. Another possibility is that all references to Canada might be deleted and the wording adjusted so as to make it acceptable to the United States and passed without our approval or participation in future studies. This result would be bound to have most unfortunate and uncomfortable repercussions on our position in OEEC.

7. We gave Ellis-Rees a full account of our thinking and instructions contained in your referenced telegrams, but we agreed to report his views to you. Since you sent your last telegram of instructions, you will have seen Washington telegram No. 976 of December 11⁵ which describes the expedient which the United States Government proposes to employ to meet their (and our) objections to the report. In view of the United States views as well as those expressed by the Chairman, you may wish to reconsider what degree of latitude you wish to give us in dealing with the resolution in view of the unfortunate alternatives.

DOLLAR IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

As requested by Ritchie in a telephone conversation with LePan, we have shown the telegram under reference to Rasminsky and have asked his views on the instructions that you propose sending to our OEEC delegation.

2. Rasminsky said that he thought the attitudes of the European countries as revealed in the telegram from Paris reinforced the conclusion that we should stick to our guns. He hoped that our representative would be instructed to submit the Canadian re-draft of the resolution prepared by the Working Group. If (as seems virtually certain) it emerged that the opposition to it was overwhelming and there was wide support for the Working Group's resolution as amended, our representative, in Rasminsky's opinion, should then make a statement explaining that it would be impossible for Canada to vote for the resolution, but that we would, of course, try to cooperate so far as possible in supplying information for the proposed enquiries. In other words, Rasminsky agrees with the line you have suggested.

3. You will appreciate that there has not been much time for us to make new soundings into the United States position. However, since we were speaking to Thibodeaux and Frank on another subject at the State Department yesterday, we took the occasion to ask again about United States views. Apparently there has been no change; and the United States representative is still under instructions to vote for the Working Group's resolution as amended and to press in addition for an agreed interpretation. Frank said that he and other State Department officers responsible for commercial policy personally favoured the line taken by Canada. But he saw no chance of altering the instructions to the United States representative, which had been arrived at as a compromise between various views within the State Department and in the Foreign Operations Agency.

DOLLAR IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

Your message has now been discussed at the Deputy Minister level with the Departments of Finance and Trade and Commerce. We have also sought the views of Rasminsky who is in Washington and his comments are reported in telegram WA-2109 which is being repeated to you. Subject to any additional comments which may emerge from the further consideration of this matter inter-departmentally on Monday, you should be guided at the meeting on December 21 by the views expressed below.

2. The description in your paragraph 2 of the origins of the reference to "the objectives of European Economic Cooperation" would not seem to explain why more emphasis was not given in the draft resolution to what was declared originally to be a principal objective of OEEC namely the development of a multilateral system of trade and payments on a world wide basis.

3. The reference in your paragraph 3 to the extract from the Ministerial Statement of July would not seem to take account of the fact that the observations in that Statement were in quite a different context and had a substantially different connotation. In any event our unwillingness to see a linking of the matters dealt with in the present resolution has been made apparent on numerous occasions in the past and we do not see how we could fairly be charged with inconsistency or with any reversal of our previous attitude.

4. The very fact that the European countries, as suggested in your paragraph 4, are not likely to welcome a reference to their GATT and IMF obligations would seem to us to confirm our worries about the atmosphere in which the subject of dollar restrictions is being discussed by them and would appear to make it all the more important that we should press for a reaffirmation (or at least attempt to avoid a denial) of these undertakings.

5. Regarding your paragraph 5, we would naturally hope that the OEEC members would agree to the deletion of the word "more" but we would emphasize that, while we regarded this as a point of some importance, as indicated in our earlier telegram, we would not consider this change as being as essential as the other alterations which we had proposed.

6. In connection with the views reported in your paragraph 6, we are not as worried as Ellis-Rees appears to be at the possibility that studies of dollar restrictions might not be carried forward under OEEC auspices and that the cause of convertibility might thereby suffer. Even if (or, possibly, especially if) OEEC were not to be particularly active in this field, these matters would of course continue to be considered by the GATT and the Fund in the terms prescribed in those international agreements.

7. With reference to your paragraph 7, when we sent off our earlier message we were already familiar with the general lines of the "expedient" proposed by the United States. We still find that device unsatisfactory and contradictory.

8. In brief, our present very strong view is not to agree to a resolution which would imply that the liberalization of dollar import restrictions by member countries (particularly those which are also members of the GATT and IMF) should be made conditional or dependent on the commercial policies of the North American countries or on the avoidance of any significant disturbance of the present pattern of intra-European trade. In holding to this position we are not merely being purists. We are certainly not underrating the importance or urgency of an improvement in U.S. commercial policies. We are also not moved by any reluctance to have our own policies examined critically. We are, however, genuinely worried by the use which might be made of the principles involved in this resolution in subsequent discussions in the OEEC, in the consideration of related matters in broader bodies such as the GATT and the Fund as well as in any bilateral talks which we may have with individual European countries. Our conclusions therefore are that:

(a) You should present the re-draft proposed in our earlier message as representing the minimum changes which we consider necessary;

(b) Other Delegations should be given an opportunity to explain in what respects they find these changes illogical or unreasonable;

(c) If, following such an airing of our views, it is evident that all other countries in the OEEC are determined to adopt the original version of the resolution, you should make it clear that:

(i) the Canadian Delegation, representing an Associated country, would not, of course, stand in the way of the passage of a resolution favoured by member countries (even though that resolution may contain a reference to Canada);

(ii) while not associating ourselves with the resolution we would wish to be as helpful as possible in connection with any studies or discussions which might be undertaken (including the provision of such information as may be desired concerning our own commercial policies and practices).

9. We would thus in effect be dissociating ourselves from the resolution while at the same time indicating our desire not to be uncooperative.

10. If the U.S. Delegation proposes the adoption of an interpretative statement for inclusion in the record, along the lines foreshadowed by our Washington Embassy, you might indicate that we are in agreement with the substance of it, but we do not consider it an adequate substitute for a revision of the quite different views expressed in the resolution itself.

11. If there would be any chance that the OEEC might prefer to avoid the issue by dispensing with the preamble entirely and removing the related language in the first recommendation, that would, of course, be a possibility worth considering as an alternative to a re-draft of those sections.

DOLLAR IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

Following are texts of two statements which we made at the OEEC Council, December 22, in connection with the debate on dollar import restrictions — C(54)280; CES 340:

First Statement

Mr. Chairman,

When we last discussed the question of dollar import restrictions at the meeting of the Council on December 14, the Canadian delegation proposed as a basis for discussion two alternative draft resolutions to the one contained in CES 337 — the earlier draft of CES 340 — which we now have before us. You said at that time, Mr. Chairman, that these two proposed resolutions might be discussed at this meeting. However, in view of the considerable progress that has been made on the basis of the draft prepared by the working group, we have considered it to be more helpful not to press for a discussion on our two previous proposals.

Instead, our authorities in Ottawa have drawn up a number of amendments to CES 340 which would make this resolution acceptable to the Canadian Government. These amendments were put on delegates' desks yesterday afternoon.

I assume, Mr. Chairman, that all delegates to the Council have had these amendments. I assume also that, in view of the long discussions we have had on this subject during which the Canadian view has been made known, (I would refer in particular to the record of the last two Council meetings), it will not be necessary for me to explain in detail why we have proposed these amendments.

I must, however, inform the Council that the Canadian Government attaches great importance to the principles involved in them. We consider that the draft resolution contained in CES 340 as it now stands contains derogations from principles long established in the GATT and the IMF. As we are full members of those organizations, we should not consider that we could justifiably accept derogations from our commitments to them in this organization even if we were convinced that the IMF and GATT rules were wrong or inadequate. We find it difficult to understand how other member countries can feel that it is appropriate to insert derogations and modifications of GATT and IMF rules in a regional resolution without reference to those prior commitments.

Quite apart from the question of the appropriateness of this procedure, the Canadian Government is convinced that the principles contained in the GATT and IMF rules with respect to the removal of QRs are the right ones. We consider that QRs should be removed as soon as balance of payments positions permit in the interests of the countries which still maintain them. At the last Council meeting we explained the reasons for this view and why, in the present circumstances, we feel that the attempt to link the removal of QRs to dollar commercial policy is likely to have unfortunate effects on commercial policy in North America and may have adverse results in Europe.

I do not, however, wish to go again into the substance of this question. I must, however, say, Mr. Chairman, that the Canadian Government will not be able to give its approval to the resolution as it now appears in CES 340. The amendments which we have suggested or some similar wording which takes account of our commitments in other organizations represent the minimum changes which my government considers necessary if we are to give our approval.

I should be grateful, therefore, Mr. Chairman, if these amendments might be discussed in conjunction with CES 340.

Second Statement

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate your willingness to permit discussion on the Canadian amendment and I, of course, agree with your summing up. We are, it appears, faced with what we regard as a most unfortunate situation. We, for our part feel unable to accept derogations from our prior commitments in other organizations and so cannot give approval to the resolution in CES 340; other member and associated countries have other views on this matter and it appears quite evident that if we are forced to give approval to the principles involved in CES 340, unless it is amended, the Council may not wish to pass the resolution in its present form — involving, as it does, Canadian participation.

With regard to the entry into the minutes proposed by the United States delegate, we are, of course, in agreement with the principles of what it contains. We do not, however, agree that it provides a satisfactory or adequate expedient for dealing with the points at issue in the resolution. I am sorry to have to inform you, Mr. Chairman, that we cannot follow this "way out of the woods".

I am instructed, however, Mr. Chairman, to tell the Council that the Canadian Government is most anxious that its position on this problem should not be interpreted as an indication that we are not prepared to co-operate in this organization in its work on dollar import restrictions. We are not able to vote in favour of the resolution, but if it is the wish of the members with full voting rights that this resolution should be adopted, the Canadian delegation will not stand in the way of its adoption merely because it contains a reference to Canada. While not associating ourselves with the resolution, we would wish to be as helpful as possible in connection with any studies or discussions which may be undertaken and we would be prepared to provide such information as may be desired concerning our own commercial policies and practices.

I hope this method of dealing with these difficulties of my government may, in the circumstances, prove an acceptable one. It is put forward in a spirit of compromise — indeed almost with Christmas spirit — a spirit of compromise which holds strongly to the desirability of maintaining our close relations in the North Atlantic area.

DOLLAR IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

Following is the text of the draft recommendation of the council concerning the relaxation of QRs on imports from the dollar area which was discussed at the OEEC council, December 22. The document is in the series CES340 of December 20. This recommendation was agreed by council subject to minor amendments mentioned in our immediately following telegram.

Text Begins:

"The council

Having regard to Article 13 (c) of the convention for European economic co-operation of 16th April, 1948;

Having regard to the resolution of the council of 6th May, 1954, concerning the relaxation of quantitative restrictions on imports from the dollar area (C(54)130);

⁶ Voir/See Document 637.

Considering the report of the Joint Trade and Intra-European Payments Committee of 25th October, 1954 on the relaxation of quantitative restrictions on imports from the dollar area (C(54)280) the comments of the Economic Committee thereon (C(54)288), and the proposals submitted by the United States delegation (C(54)299),

Considering that it is in the interest of member countries, to the extent that circumstances permit and taking due account of the objectives of European economic co-operation, to make further efforts to reduce quantitative restrictions on imports of goods (and restrictions on invisible transactions and transfers) from the United States and Canada and from non-member countries of the organization with a view to achieving a sound and balanced multilateral trading system on a world-wide basis;

Considering, however, that such progress should not endanger the results already achieved in the liberalisation of intra-European trade and payments;

*Recognising that the speed with which the advance in the removal of restrictions on imports from the dollar area can be achieved, must depend both upon action taken by countries in the dollar area and on developments in the balance of payments situation of member countries; desirous, therefore, to ensure close co-operation with the United States and Canada in this matter;

I. RECOMMENDS:

1. Member countries should continue individually their efforts to reduce, each to the extent that its economic and financial situation permits and taking into account the objectives of European economic co-operation, quantitative restrictions on imports of goods (and restrictions on invisible transactions and transfers) from the United States and Canada.

2. The associated countries should:

(a) Likewise continue their efforts to ensure a more liberal policy in their commercial relations with member countries, thereby facilitating the efforts of member countries to relax their quantitative restrictions on imports from the United States and Canada; and

(b) keep the organization regularly informed of measures which they have taken in this field and of their programmes and policies for further progress.

II. DECIDES:

3. Member countries shall inform the organization of any new measures which they take regarding the quantitative restrictions of imports of goods (and restrictions on invisible transactions and transfers) from the United States and Canada and, in particular, of any change in the lists of goods which may be imported without restriction from these countries.

Alternative text suggested by the United States Delegation.*

Recognising that the speed with which further sustained progress in the removal of restrictions on imports from the dollar area can be achieved would be facilitated by action taken by countries in that area to reduce barriers to trade; desirous, therefore, to ensure close co-operation with the United States and Canada in this matter;

4.(a) The organization shall undertake, at intervals to be determined later, an examination of the problem of such restrictions vis-à-vis the United States and Canada so that a report thereon may be made to the council;

(b) The examination shall include:

(i) A study of the progress achieved by each member country in the removal on such restrictions vis-à-vis the United States and Canada and of the difficulties encountered in their removal, the effects thereof, and the obstacles to further sustained progress;

(ii) A study, to the fullest extent possible, of the effects of such liberalisation of intra-European trade and on the trade and payments position of member countries with the United States, and Canada as well as with the E.P.U. area;

(iii) A study, within the framework of the general situation, of the effects of action taken by associated countries; and

(iv) An analysis on the basis of these studies, of the extent to which further liberalisation of imports of goods (and restrictions on invisible transactions and transfers) from the United States and Canada is possible.

(c) In the conduct of these studies and analysis, the considerations affecting each of the three main groups of commodities, i.e. food and feeding-stuffs, raw materials, and manufactured goods, should be presented to the fullest extent possible.

5.(a) The Executive Committee shall decide which body of the organization shall undertake the examination provided for in paragraph 4 and shall arrange that a report on the results of the first examination shall be submitted to the Council not later than 30th June 1955.

(b) The Joint Trade and intra-European Payments Committee shall, in due course, propose to the Council a questionnaire which should be sent to member countries in order to provide material for the examination referred to in paragraph 4. In drawing it up, the Committee may take into consideration, inter alia, the suggestions made by the United States delegation in Annex B to document C(54)299.

Draft entry in the minutes of the Council

The Council agreed that the study envisaged in paragraph 4 (a) of the recommendation on the relaxation of quantitative restrictions on imports from the dollar area should not take the form of a "negative list exercise" of the type undertaken by the Steering Board for Trade in connection with the extension of intra-European liberalisation of trade". DOLLAR IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

Following careful preparation by the chairman during the past two weeks, the OEEC council again discussed the draft recommendation concerning the relaxation of QRs on imports from the dollar area on December 22. As a basis for discussion it had a clean draft of CES 337 under the new CES 340 sent to you in our immediately preceding telegram.

2. The chairman had secure agreement on most of the points on which there had been reserves at the previous meeting of the council (see our telegram No. 1095 of December 4). The solutions to these points which had been left open are contained in CES 340 and it only remained at the council meeting to secure formal acceptance of them.

3. It was agreed that the resolution should apply not only to the relaxation of QRs on imports from the dollar area, but also to restrictions on "invisible transactions and transfers". Therefore, the brackets around this phrase disappeared in the final draft and the title of the recommendation has been altered to include the phrase, "and invisibles on transactions and transfers" after imports. It is understood that associate countries will also provide information on their policies with regard to invisibles.

4. Although at the request of the United States delegation this understanding is not stated explicitly, the word "trade" in para 2(a) was altered to "commerce" in order to imply the study of invisibles as well as of visibles. This was agreeable to the United States delegation. The Swiss delegate requested that the IMF be associated with the work on invisibles and this was agreed.

5. The Turks and Greeks had been insisting on a modification to para I (1) which would have rendered it inapplicable for dollar commodities whose production and export had been subject to subsidy. The United States delegation could not accept this modification. Consequently the Turks and the Greeks agreed to accept the original draft if it were understood that the phrase, "and taking into account the objectives of European economic co-operation", be understood to take account of the subsidies problem and in addition, if the United States and Canada were prepared to have a full discussion of the problem during the future examinations. The United States agreed to this expedient.

6. With these lesser problems out of the way, the chairman then asked us to introduce our amendments which had previously been circulated (your telegram No. 958 of December 8). We introduced the amendments in a statement sent to you under telegram 1166 of December 23.

7. The United States delegate responded by proposing the following entry in the council minutes:

"The council resolution on dollar liberalization, C(54) ... does not involve a modification of existing obligations arising under international agreements for those members who have subscribed such agreements, and in particular the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, nor does it prejudice any revision of these agreements that may be agreed to in the future".

8. Although the United States would have been prepared to accept this entry as a United States interpretation, they, of course, hoped that all member countries would subscribe to it. The United States delegate said that although they agreed in principle with the Canadian amendments, they were also prepared to approve the draft in CES 340 with their interpretation in the minutes.

9. The Norwegian delegate said that his government did not regard the OEEC resolution as a derogation to their obligations in the IMF and GATT. They intended to live up fully to those obligations. They envisaged the OEEC exercise as a means of achieving the full application of GATT and IMF rules. They were prepared to subscribe to the United States interpretation although they hoped, however, that it would not be necessary to amend the agreed text of the resolution.

10. The Italian delegate spoke in similar terms. He said it was not the Italian intention to derogate from IMF and GATT principles.

11. The Belgian delegate spoke more forcibly about our amendments. In essence, he said that it was impossible for his delegation to accept them. The Swiss delegate also indicated his disapproval and commented that our draft would result in their being no mention of European economic co-operation.

12. In view of the complete lack of support for our amendments and in accordance with your instructions, we made another statement (text sent in our telegram No. 1166 of December 23). Our remarks were welcomed by the council as they paved the way for the adoption of the resolution which was duly carried out.

13. Following the adoption, the United States delegate intervened again and referred to the fact that there had been no objection to his proposed entry in the minutes. From this he assumed that all countries were in agreement with it. There was no objection. According to the rules of the organization, if there is no objection to such an entry in the minutes, it is assumed to be universally acceptable. Although the chairman did not say this explicitly, this fact nevertheless remains.

14. In making his last statement the United States representative said he was concerned about the Canadian position as we stated our view that the resolution at certain points involved a derogation of principles long established in the GATT and the fund. He wondered, whether, since his draft entry in the minutes had been acceptable to all other delegations, we could not also agree to it. He thought there might be difficulties in Washington if, though all countries agreed that the resolution did not involve a modification of GATT and IMF obligations, the Canadian Government insisted that it did, and consequently reserved his position until the point was settled.

15. In answer to one or two enquiries, the chairman made it clear that the exercise would not begin until the United States was in, and said that if the United States and Canadian points of view could not be reconciled, the question would have to come before the council again.

16. You will see that this put us in a rather difficult position. We stated at the council that while we could not agree under present instructions to modify our interpretation of the resolution, we welcomed the indication that all OEEC members agreed that it did not involve a modification of other existing obligations. This did not appear to satisfy the United States delegate and the matter had to be left open. It was agreed that we and the United States should discuss the draft entry in the minutes during the first week of January.

17. You will appreciate that if we accept fully the entry in the minutes, we shall have undermined our objections of principle on the resolution. In fact, we should almost reach the stage where we might accept the resolution with the interpretation. If we merely welcome the agreement of other countries, we may not meet the difficulties of the United States delegation.

18. We should be grateful to have at least your preliminary views before January 3, when we shall have to discuss the matter again with the United States delegation.

OEEC MINISTERIAL GROUP ON PROBLEMS OF CONVERTIBILITY; THE FUTURE OF OEEC

During a talk with Cahan of the OEEC Secretariat yesterday we enquired about preparation for the "Ministerial Examination Group" which the Council agreed to set up (C(54)131) in order to examine the different problems which will arise if a number of Member countries re-establish convertibility. A definite date for the Ministerial meeting in London has not yet been set, however, that the Alternates will meet in Paris on June 16th to prepare for the Ministerial Meeting.

2. One of the terms of reference (para 3 (b) of C(54)131) instructs the Working Group to examine:

“What suggestions should be made to Member Countries and Associate Countries concerning the arrangements to be envisaged for international cooperation in both the financial and commercial fields, if a number of Member Countries establish convertibility”.

3. These terms of reference in effect raise the question of the future of OEEC and the appropriate international organization to undertake responsibility for trade and financial consultation during the period of limited convertibility and afterwards.⁷

4. You will have seen the paper entitled “International Organizations”, one of five which were recently given by the U.K. to the U.S. Government in connection with proposed talks at the official level on the move to convertibility. Copies of these papers were attached to Leslie Rowan’s letter of May 3rd to Ken Taylor.† This paper sets forth the view agreed at the Commonwealth Conference that a Joint IMF/GATT Advisory Group be established “to provide a continuing forum where the world economic situation and also the problems arising in the movement to freer trade and currencies for particular countries would be kept under review and constructively discussed.” The U.K. paper then asks the U.S. Administration whether it:

(a) agrees with the objectives which the Commonwealth had in mind in proposing the IMF/GATT Advisory Group

(b) agrees that the proposed mechanism would be the best for securing these objectives, or

(c) can suggest alternative methods of securing the agreed objectives.

5. In the consideration of these questions which will probably be presented in some appropriate form to the Ministers’ Working Group, the fate of OEEC as a useful economic organization will have to be decided. Although, to our knowledge there has not been very much definitive thinking on the future of OEEC in the Secretariat or in the main Delegations, you will be aware that there is strong feeling in OEEC circles that some form of European economic cooperation should continue after the major currencies become convertible. These circles consider that the OEEC organization, with its facilities for discussing trade and financial matters in restricted high level boards (i.e. the Managing Board of EPU and the Steering Board for Trade) under the umbrella of a Council which has proved capable of taking decisions, has been extremely successful. This is also our view.

6. At the Ministers’ Working Group two questions will probably arise: whether OEEC can usefully continue after some currencies become convertible if an

⁷ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Does this mean the long run arrangements. Presumably Yes? [Auteur inconnu/Author unidentified]

IMF/GATT Advisory Board should be established, or whether a modified OEEC might be a more appropriate body to provide facilities for consultation during the move to full convertibility⁸ and perhaps afterward.

7. The first question — whether OEEC can continue to provide a forum for high-level consultation on trade and financial questions if an IMF/GATT Board were established — can be answered quickly and in the negative. It would, in our opinion, be unrealistic to suppose that two bodies — whose restricted committees would have largely the same membership could usefully consult on the same problems. OEEC might continue to exist as an umbrella for EPA, and the work of the vertical committees but this would appear doubtful, and, in our view, unnecessary.

8. The next question involves a choice between the advantages and disadvantages of an IMF/GATT Advisory Board and a Modified OEEC as the appropriate body for economic consultation after a measure of convertibility is achieved. We propose here to set out our preliminary views on the factors involved in such a choice.

Factors Involved in an "OEEC Solution"

1. The OEEC at present deals with financial and trade problems in the restricted Managing Board of EPU and the Steering Board for Trade. These two boards, which are composed generally of senior officials closely concerned with the administration of external policy in their capitals, meet each month in Paris. The boards prepare decisions which, after being vetted by committees of OEEC on which all members are represented, are put up to the Council for final approval. This organization of work has proved extremely successful and directly and indirectly has a profound influence on the economic policies of member countries. The contacts and experience which have been developed during the discussion of mainly regional questions could probably, and indeed is being developed to provide equally successful consideration of the broader problems posed by convertibility.
2. The United States and Canada, as associate members, have developed a close working relationship with the OEEC. Continued associate membership with European countries during the move toward convertibility might prove the most easily manageable relationship with these countries. On the other hand, if necessary, Canada and the United States might accept full membership — thus giving a North Atlantic flavour to the organization.
3. The expansion of OEEC into a North Atlantic Organization might be accomplished without entering into the lengthy negotiations that would probably be necessary if the rules and constitution of the IMF and GATT had to be altered. If the IMF and GATT were not altered, there would be no assurance that the decisions of these bodies would be coordinated. An intermediate Advisory Board of IMF and GATT might create more confusion than coordination since its advice on closely linked subjects might be given different interpretation and action in the different bodies.

⁸ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

The interim period. [Auteur inconnu/Author unidentified]

4. An Organization for North Atlantic Economic Cooperation would fulfil the requirements of Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty. It would provide a continuing organization for carrying out the economic work of NATO (which is now being done in OEEC but which would have to be taken over by NATO if the OEEC ceased to exist). Even more important, it would provide an organization for economic consultation and decision in case of emergency. At present there is no body which could do this adequately.

5. An Organization for North Atlantic Economic Cooperation (ONEAC) need not, and in our view should not, be subject to NATO although it should give that Organization full cooperation on matters of concern to it. They should be separate Organizations dealing with separate terms of reference. Too close a relationship with NATO would be undesirable because of the difficulty it would create for countries such as Switzerland and Sweden (and perhaps even Germany) which are not members of NATO. In addition, too close a relationship with NATO would probably make ONEAC more suspect in the eyes of countries outside the North Atlantic area and render essential cooperation with these countries more difficult.

6. One drawback of a North Atlantic Organization would be its limited regional character. This, however, is a political rather than a practical drawback. The Sterling Area would be adequately represented by the U.K., particularly as the members recognize that the responsibility for management of the Sterling Area rests with the U.K.; the Dollar Area would be represented by the U.S. and Canada; the former EPU area and territories would be included or represented; the rest of the world could be represented through close association with the GATT and the Fund. If necessary, the more important countries outside the North Atlantic area might become associate members and have missions accredited to the organization, but it might be assumed that they would not normally participate in decisions.

7. The terms of reference of an Organization for North Atlantic Economic Cooperation in the transitional period of limited convertibility (which can be expected to continue for a considerable period of time) could bear a relationship to the GATT and IMF similar to the relationship between OEEC and those bodies. The "ONAEC" could carry out the detailed negotiations and decisions necessary on the path toward full convertibility under the cover of a general waiver from the GATT and IMF. If this were done, the GATT and IMF need not compromise their constitutions in order to meet the needs of limited convertibility, and could maintain their principles as the ultimate objectives not only of themselves but also of ONAEC. ONAEC, on the other hand, could approach the solution of problems on an empirical basis.

8. If the methods proposed above were adopted, a body of experience could be built up on the working of an OEEC type of organization — combining consultation on trade and finance in a convertible world. If the experience were successful, a reorganization of GATT and IMF might be facilitated at some future date, if this were found to be desirable.

9. The main disadvantages to a North Atlantic solution are political. Some important countries in the Western World would not be directly represented, and would probably not welcome their exclusion. Practical cooperation with these countries could be assured, however, by means of associate membership or by their representation through a member of their monetary area and close association with GATT and IMF. An important advantage of a North Atlantic solution is that it could be put into effect without raising all the issues, including membership, connected with the formation of a new organization. It could be represented merely as a continuation of an old organization with a gradual addition to its terms of reference.

Factors Involved in IMF/GATT Solution

1. The advantages of the IMF/GATT Advisory Board solution would appear to be largely political. Such a solution would enable the main countries in all areas of the Western World to be included in the Board. This might have its disadvantages as well:

(a) Assuming the headquarters of the Advisory Board were set up in Europe, the distance between outlying capitals such as New Delhi and Canberra would make it difficult, if not impossible, for such Governments to provide the same type of representation as the North Atlantic Countries (i.e. Experts closely associated with the administration of their Government's foreign economic policy).

(b) The "common denominator" of agreement would probably be much lower if countries outside the North Atlantic area were included.

(c) NATO economic work would have to be undertaken in that Organization by expanding the Secretariat and Delegations.

2. There might be serious drawbacks to an IMF/GATT Advisory Board. The advice that would be given would be the advice of only a few countries. The decisions which would have to be taken would occur in two widely separated bodies which have not cooperated well in the past. In both of these widely separated bodies, the representatives of the smaller countries might differ substantially on many issues. This is a difficulty which has been well handled in OEEC.

3. An essential element in the success of OEEC has been the close association of the smaller countries with the Secretariat and members of the restricted boards. Through this close association, their views can be made known before the Board's proposals are drawn up in final form. In addition, the Board's proposals are always vetted by subordinate committees on which all Member countries are represented. This permits compromises on the spot with the help of the same Secretariat which has drafted the resolutions. Finally, in the Council, the smaller countries have often agreed to majority decisions (a unanimous decision is required) when they have represented only a small minority because of the spirit of compromise which has been developed in the OEEC Council.

4. This system of information, close contact, and compromise would be practically impossible if an Advisory Board were separated from the delegations of smaller countries and if the delegations of these countries to the IMF and GATT continue to be separated by the Atlantic Ocean. The conclusion one is forced to is that an IMF/GATT Advisory Board might create more rather than less confusion unless it operated in extraordinarily favourable circumstances.

5. We do not wish to imply that an IMF/GATT Advisory Board could not be set up or that it could not provide a focus for useful co-ordination among the more important countries of the West. It would, however, appear to be a not-very-happy ad hoc attempt to make a bad experiment work (i.e. the separation of the Trade and Monetary organizations). A North Atlantic solution, on the other hand, would, on the face of it, represent the reinforcement of success — for the OEEC has been an outstanding success.

9. We have put these preliminary views to you because you will, no doubt, have to give further consideration to the problem of economic organization in the near future. We have not discussed these views to any great extent, but they represent a feeling which we have had for some time that the alternatives (of which we have discussed only one) to the IMF/GATT solution should be fully aired before a decision is taken. As we have pointed out, there will be an important discussion of this question at the Ministers' Working Group. Consequently, preliminary Canadian consideration of the issues we have discussed might be helpful before their first meeting in July.

10. We should be grateful for your comments.

ALTERNATES OF OEEC MINISTERIAL GROUP ON CONVERTIBILITY

The alternates of the OEEC Ministerial Examination Group have, during the past three days, held a most useful confrontation of views on the three categories of convertibility problems outlined in the United Kingdom memorandum (GMC(54)1): i.e. trade, finance, international organization. No commitments have been made, but the discussion has clarified and pointed up a limited number of specific questions for consideration by the Ministerial Group when it meets in London on July 16. It is hoped that the Ministers can take an agreed line on these questions in order to provide direction for the more detailed discussions by the alternates which will continue during the summer.

2. Because of the close inter-connection of the trade, finance and organization issues, it is important to take account of the interdependence of country positions on each of the three categories of problems. We shall discuss them first separately and then indicate the issues which will have to be considered by the Ministers.

International Organization

3. Rowan in introducing the debate on this subject said that the United Kingdom had three general objectives in presenting the preliminary ideas for the international organizations required after a move toward convertibility (Chapter 4, GMC(54)1). First, they wished to work through existing organizations. Second, problems of trade, finance and internal policy should be considered together. ("It was one of the major lessons of post war economics that problems of trade and finance cannot be dealt with separately"). Third, the cases of debtor and creditor countries should be considered together. It had been a deficiency of most organizations that they had often been considered separately — thus giving rise to partial solutions instead of full multilateral solutions.

4. These considerations had led the United Kingdom to suggest the IMF/GATT Advisory Board. On the other hand, Rowan added it was "extremely important" that what had been built up in OEEC should be maintained. It was difficult to envisage exactly what OEEC would do in the post convertible period, but countries should approach it with the "belief" that it would continue even though the nature of its work might change.

5. The continental reaction to the United Kingdom proposals was closely in line with the alternative which we set out in our letter No. 1737 and GMC(54)2. All the continental representatives were in agreement with the United Kingdom objectives but none felt that the IMF/GATT Advisory Board solution would achieve them. Ockrent (Benelux), Bauer (Switzerland) and Cattani (Italy) were the principal spokesmen for an alternative OEEC solution and they gained the uncommitted support of all the continental representatives. Their view is based on two tenets: (1) The European co-operation and methods of work established in OEEC should continue, (2) The problems of convertibility can only be solved in an organization composed of "like minded" countries with a will to co-operate. They have in mind the OEEC area plus Canada and the United States plus the Commonwealth.

6. Although no single precise organization was put forward by all the continentals, the best consolidation of their views might be: a continuation of OEEC with Canada and the United States as full members or (to meet the difficulties of full membership of the United States) a continuation of associate membership with close co-operation in decisions. Ockrent's view is that some of the more important Commonwealth countries might join as associate members.

7. Ockrent feels, and we believe he has considerable support for this view, that the expanded OEEC should have considerable powers of decision both with regard to trade and particularly with regard to financial matters.

8. Calvet (France) was the only continental representative who said that he was "not hostile" to the IMF/GATT bridge group but he too spoke in favour of an OEEC solution. He and others emphasized the change in the relations between OEEC and the associated countries since the end of Marshall Aid. Canada and the United States — but of course particularly the United States — had in effect participated in all major OEEC decisions and no decision of importance had been taken without their concurrence.

9. Martin (United States) was very reserved in his statements on the question of organization, merely expressing appreciation for the work of OEEC and the United States wish that it should continue. He reserved position on the IMF/GATT group. In private, however, the United States delegation, although without instructions, were most concerned over the European efforts to denigrate the GATT and the Fund and subsume some of their powers.

10. After hearing the continental views, Rowan in rebuttal emphasized some of the drawbacks of an OEEC solution: the world wide system implied by a move to convertibility required a world wide organization and rules of universal application. Outside countries would not be prepared to accept direction from the North Atlantic area. The United States must be brought in as a full member of any organization supervising convertibility. The United States was already a member of the GATT and the Fund; it was unlikely that she would become a full member of OEEC. An extension of OEEC as envisaged by the continentals implied a revision of the OEEC Convention which would in effect provide all the difficulties of setting up a new institution, the avoidance of which was a prime objective of United Kingdom policy. (Marjolin and others denied that the Convention need be altered — insisting that all that was required was the will to co-operate in the North Atlantic context).

11. The two alternative views held by the United States, United Kingdom on the one hand and the continental countries on the other will be put to the Ministers. We understand that the United Kingdom do not intend to insist on an IMF/GATT group as a rigid alternative to an OEEC solution but they hold strongly to their view that the IMF and the GATT must continue to be the main repositories of decision.

12. Although there are obviously serious drawbacks as well as advantages to both solutions, we have come to the view that the practical objections and difficulties raised by an OEEC solution of the type envisaged by Ockrent whereby OEEC would assume some of the powers of GATT and the Fund are much greater than those raised by the alternative of trying by some means to improve the co-ordination of the Fund and the GATT. It may be, however, that OEEC can continue to provide a useful forum for regional problems though with substantially less powers over finance and perhaps trade than it exerts at present.

13. Our following telegram deals with the discussions on trade and finance.

Trade Rules Chapter 2 GMC(54)1

Rowan introduced chapter 2 of the United Kingdom memorandum with a reassurance (which has been repeated many times in the past 18 months) that the United Kingdom did not seek convertibility as an end in itself but as a vehicle for increased trade. The pattern might be altered but the level should be higher. He emphasized the universality of the United Kingdom approach; in order to draw the full benefits from convertibility, trading blocks and bilateral arrangements must disappear.

2. The original United Kingdom views on procedure regarding trade rules had been that they should not be drawn up definitively until convertibility had been in operation for a period of a year. After a closer examination of the problems involved and in view of the substantial progress which had been made in the past 18 months since the United Kingdom proposals were first put forward, they now felt that the opportunity provided by the GATT review this year, to set up revised world trade rules, should not be lost. Provided there was a will to operate GATT rules, the United Kingdom felt that they could provide a reasonable basis for detailed trade rules. These might be agreed before or contemporaneously with the move to convertibility.

3. After agreeing to the new trade rules in GATT, the United Kingdom now envisages a trial period or a period of grace of perhaps one year during which countries would move toward the full application of the rules. After the period of grace they should be applied fully, and on a non-discrimination basis, subject to limited escape provisions.

4. The OEEC relationship to this arrangement as seen by the United Kingdom is that the OEEC liberalization code should be maintained as a "bridge" during the period of grace in order to ensure that convertibility does not introduce a new series of QRs, discrimination and bilateral arrangements in Europe. At the end of the period of grace the OEEC code would be subsumed into the GATT.

5. Referring to para 10 of GMC(54)1, Rowan said it was the United Kingdom view that discrimination against dollar goods would tend to break down under the weight of economic factors after convertibility and it was important that as much progress as possible should be made in the elimination of discrimination before the move to convertibility; this would lessen the shock. (Rowan's view is based on the simple analysis that if convertible or non-convertible countries have to pay in convertible currencies for imports, it is to their advantage to permit their purchase in the cheapest markets without discrimination. Special arrangements — perhaps a retreat from European liberalization — might be necessary in cases where there is a wide gap in price between European and North American products and excessive import demand at the lower North American price). The United Kingdom envisages that, after the transitional period, countries would either have to remove all discrimination or justify its retention.

6. The United Kingdom hold strongly to their view that in an emergency, countries should have the right to apply QRS and justify them later. It is their hope, however, that discussions on developing emergency situations might provide solutions which would avert the necessity to apply QRS.

7. Calvet (France), although admitting that the United Kingdom objectives of enlarging the trading area were shared by France, indicated that France was very worried about the implications of convertibility for European liberalization. Without adequate credit arrangements the countries which were unable to make their currencies convertible might be forced to revert to bilateral arrangements. There was a real danger that the split between convertibles and non-convertibles in Europe would develop in this way. When pressed, Calvet expressed the view that the non-convertibles would require credit arrangements which were at least on a par with those now available in EPU. This may represent France's bargaining counter for her agreement to continue the OEEC liberalization code in the transitional period.

8. Calvet had clearly not thought through the future relations with the dollar area which he felt would be very delicate. He said he was surprised that the United Kingdom memorandum had made no mention of what the United States might do in return for a removal of discrimination on dollar goods. Other delegations are also thinking along these lines but few have any rebuttal for the United Kingdom view that the removal of discrimination, since it will obviously be in the interests of all European countries after some of them are convertible, must break down. The United Kingdom had not contemplated any specific "bargains" with the North American countries. Ockrent suggested that the OEEC should pay more attention to a study of the tariff question so that OEEC and the United States could talk a common language. At present OEEC's preoccupation with QRS, of which United States trade was relatively free, implied a certain impotence in bargaining.

9. With reference to third countries, Calvet felt that bilateral arrangements had been extremely important in maintaining trade and that countries would have to continue to resort to them.

10. Müller (Germany) spoke in favour of having OEEC operate the trade rules though he did not distinguish between the transitional period and afterward. If the OEEC code were maintained the liberalization targets should be increased for convertible countries and non-convertibles should not discriminate. Settlements between convertible and non-convertible countries should be in convertible currencies and there should be no bilateral arrangements. Convertible countries should not increase restrictions without prior consultation and they should submit to a strict discipline and examination of their internal, trade and financial situations. OEEC was the proper forum for these examinations.

11. Müller felt that European liberalization with the dollar area should be harmonized. (He made no reference to the economic forces which would bring this about), but felt that such harmonization should always be effected by increased liberalization and not by a levelling down. He also mentioned that this operation should be accompanied by a freer United States trade policy.

12. Germany admitted that bilateral trade and payments arrangements were not compatible with convertibility and that they would have to be removed gradually. One thing was certain: In Europe there must be no return to bilateralism. Outside Europe the situation was complicated by the fact that third countries wish to continue their bilateral arrangements. A discussion of this problem should be undertaken with the framework of OEEC.

13. Christiansen (Denmark) voiced fears that Europe would be split into two camps by a move to convertibility of some members. While agreeing with the general objectives of convertibility, he felt that multilateralism does not always give rise to maximum trade and that this problem should be investigated.

14. Ockrent (Benelux) agreed with the United Kingdom view that in the transitional period the OEEC liberalization code should be enforced and that the negative list exercise should be continued "avec foi". He recognized the code having two classes of members, the convertibles and the non-convertibles but emphasized that financial arrangements must be such as to make single class membership possible. On the question of the application of QRS, Benelux is in favour of a requirement for prior consultation. They feel some method can be found to suppress the speculative effects of the consultation.

15. The looseness of this debate on trade problems was due to the lack of precision in the assumptions. The problem is altered radically depending on:

(1) The number of European countries which go convertible, i.e. whether France and Italy are convertible or not.

(2) The degree of adequacy of financial arrangements for non-convertible countries.

(3) The organizational arrangements, i.e. an OEEC with powers of decision over trade and finance on a continuing basis would be more capable of dealing with the trade problems of the split than if it had only transitional powers — over trade rules without the support of an EPU.

16. Since none of these interlocking problems had been solved, it was found to be impossible to come to any unanimous view on the important aspects of the trade problems. Ellis-Rees, the chairman attempted to focus attention on the continuation of the OEEC liberalization code in the transitional period. All the future convertible countries agreed to this. Calvet, however, was not prepared to agree even in principle. He felt that the equality of convertible and non-convertible countries would end with EPU liquidation. Further, the IMF would probably not function with equality for convertible and non-convertible countries but would probably favour the convertible countries. In these circumstances, it might be impossible for the non-European countries to agree to maintain the code (i.e. to agree not to discriminate). Cattani (Italy) supported these views.

17. Rowan did his best to point out the alternative to a decision to maintain the code. The alternative was a relapse into bilateralism and discrimination within Europe and a further weakening of the non-convertible economies thus postponing their ultimate achievement of convertibility. Neither Calvet nor Cattani (Italy) were particularly impressed with this argument, though the future convertibles all agreed.

18. What seem to be shaping up are two questions to Ministers:

(i) Is it agreed that the long term trade rules should be drawn up and, after the transitional period, supervised by GATT?

(ii) If so, is the OEEC code to continue during the transitional period?

19. On the second question France and Italy supported by the weaker countries are likely to hold out for a high level of financial support in return for their agreement to continue a non-discriminatory policy in Europe. In this, they are likely to have some United States support since that country would not be prepared to see the whole European economy which they have shepherded for the past eight years, fall apart. The other continental countries would also be most concerned at such a development and it is partly to prevent it that they wish to maintain a strong OEEC with powers of decision relating to both trade and financial matters.

20. A further telegram on financial questions follows.

Financial Problems. Chapter 3, GMC (54)1.

The discussion of financial problems connected with a move to convertibility was helped initially by the tacit assumption of all the alternates that EPU would be liquidated when some of its members made their currencies convertible. This was the first public admission of this fact although it has been generally assumed since the last ministerial council.

2. Given the disappearance of EPU, the alternates turned their attention to possible future sources of credit and the manner in which it might be administered. The United Kingdom memorandum had made two basic proposals: Firstly it was important that countries should ascertain as soon as possible what facilities they could expect from the IMF. The United Kingdom felt that the best — indeed the only — way of finding this out was for countries, both future convertibles and future non-convertibles, to ask the Fund.

3. Secondly, since the Fund would probably feel able to afford more help to the stronger countries — especially those making their currencies convertible — and since the future non-convertible countries would probably require additional credit, the United Kingdom had suggested the formation of a European fund to provide temporary supplementary credit. It was their hope that the United States would agree that its dollar resources which form the initial and “special resources” assets of EPU might be transferred to the European fund.

4. Shearer, one of the United States representatives, made a guarded statement indicating that the United States would look with “a favourable eye” on this use of its stake in EPU provided it were part of an arrangement which would adequately provide for the credit requirements of the post convertible period.

5. All the alternates were agreed that OEEC member countries should approach the Fund in order to establish the extent of their drawing rights. Nicholaides (Greece) wondered whether a preliminary joint approach might not be preferable and there was some support for at least a joint preliminary study of requirements to be undertaken in OEEC with a view to a possible preliminary joint approach to the Fund. The formal approaches to the Fund, must, however, be made individually.

6. Ockrent (Benelux) was able to give his support to the United Kingdom proposal for a European fund on three conditions:

(i) That the EPU resources on liquidation should be turned over to the European fund;

(ii) That creditors should not be asked to contribute additional amounts;

(iii) That the resources of the European fund should be available in principle to all members of OEEC. This would strengthen OEEC's control over its use.

7. Bauer (Switzerland) reserved his position on the European fund. The United Kingdom paper had suggested that countries which are not members of the IMF but which currently make credit available through EPU might continue to provide such credit via a European fund. Bauer made no reference to this suggestion.

8. Calvet (France) spoke in the same vein as he had spoken during the discussions on trade problems. If it were assumed that EPU would disappear when several countries made their currencies convertible, a split between convertibles and non-convertibles was greatly to be feared. There might be a reversion to the relationships existing in the 1930's when there were a mixture of convertible and non-convertible currencies and a spate of bilateral arrangements.

9. Calvet was doubtful whether the resources at the disposal of the non-convertible countries would be sufficient to prevent the split. He was fearful that the IMF would show little interest in the non-convertible currencies. He was doubtful of the concept of the European fund. Its concept was quite different from that of EPU which has proved capable of finding multilateral solutions. The European fund would be obliged to limit itself to partial solutions. When pressed by Ellis-Rees who asked him pointedly:

"If the resources for the European fund could be found, what would the French attitude be?" Calvet replied somewhat dolefully that, "Frankly, he was not very happy about it." Cattani (Italy) shared the concern and the misapprehension of Calvet.

10. Notwithstanding the views of Calvet and Cattani, Rowan expressed some satisfaction at, "the more forthcoming attitude on the European fund". He thought most of the concern of the French and Italians could be ironed out when more detailed discussions took place.

11. There was little discussion on exchange rate policy as the United Kingdom did not consider the alternates a suitable forum for an exchange of views. The United Kingdom have already discussed this question bilaterally with the Europeans. A number of European representatives, including those from Benelux, Germany, and Switzerland stressed the importance of maintaining stable exchange rates.

12. The Ministers will probably be asked to express their views on the proposal for individual approaches to the IMF and on the principle of creating a European fund. The future non-convertibles, led by the French, may, however, be expected to postpone giving their agreement in principle until they have a fuller idea of the extent of its resources. The indications are that they would not be inclined to accept the principle of non-discrimination (implied by the continuation of the OEEC liberalization code) and the supervision of the OEEC members in the context of the European fund unless the ante (in the form of increased resource) is raised so that they can call on at least as much credit as is now available in EPU.

13. It is, of course, too soon to envisage bargaining positions. No one has, as yet, fully thought through the mechanism of the European fund and its possible relationship to IMF. It may be, however, that the French will be in the thick of the bargaining: On the one hand bargaining for increased credit under the threat of withdrawing from the non-discriminatory requirements of the liberalization code. The implementation of such a threat could hardly be in France's long or even short term interests but one is inclined to wonder whether they will not hold out for credit facilities adequate for them to maintain full multilateral trading relations with the rest of Europe. On the other hand if they are unable to get adequate credit, a better alternative for them would appear to be devaluation and an early move to convertibility along with the stronger countries.

14. While the foregoing remarks are based only on conjecture, they nevertheless point up the elements of the delicate negotiating problems that will probably face the Ministers — if not in the July meeting, at some future meeting.

ARRANGEMENTS RE CONVERTIBILITY

Your letter No. 1737 of June 4 and your various telegrams indicate of course that the working out of suitable techniques and organisational arrangements for international cooperation in financial and commercial fields in conditions of convertibility is a difficult and complex problem. You will have noted from the record of our May 26 and 27 discussions with U.S. officials some of the problems which we encountered.⁹

On the proposal for some form of OEEC arrangement to look after this problem our views are similar to those which Rowan expounded at the meeting of alternates. You will appreciate that as our widespread trading interests are best served by maintaining and strengthening the world wide and multilateral nature of GATT and IMF, we could hardly favour any less broadly based institution to deal with international commercial and financial matters. We were therefore disturbed at the views which the European representatives put forward; and in the light of your letter No. 1737 we are pleased that you have not supported these views.

These questions no doubt will be aired at the meeting of the Continuing Committee in London¹⁰ and you will have an opportunity to discuss them when Rasminsky and Plumtre visit your Mission.

ARRANGEMENTS RE CONVERTIBILITY

We were glad to receive your views on the international organization aspects of the convertibility problem which we share.

2. We sent you our letter No. 1737 [June 4, 1954], which accurately forecast the discussion on organization at the alternates, in order that you might be fully aware of the OEEC alternative which was germinating on the continent. It did not reflect a preference for this solution on our part, but it was obviously a point of view with which the alternates would have to contend.

3. During the discussions in the alternates, it became clear that an OEEC solution would not gain the support of the United Kingdom or the United States. I felt obliged to support Rowan in the face of continental opposition in favour of a GATT/IMF solution as set out in my letter No. 1846.† I am glad that you have confirmed the views I expressed.

4. The United Kingdom proposal of an IMF/GATT Advisory Board got no support at the alternates meeting and it now seems that it is not likely to be pursued strongly.

5. Our present view is that the ultimate solution is likely to be the working out of closer co-operation between GATT and the fund by more direct means and without the necessity of setting up anything in the nature of a new organization.

ARRANGEMENTS RE CONVERTIBILITY

For Mr. Wilgress.

The following paper which deals with the various issues raised in GMC(54)3(1st Revision) has been prepared interdepartmentally to serve as guidance concerning the issues which are expected to be discussed at the meeting of Mr. Butler's group on July 15th. Although we appreciate that the meeting is taking place under OEEC auspices, you will no doubt wish to arrange with Mr. Robertson for appropriate participation by Canada House in order that they may have the background of these meetings for any subsequent talks in London with United Kingdom authorities.

Text of paper begins:

(a) Permanent Trade Rules

1. In the light of recent experience it should now be recognized that it is not realistic to expect all countries to accept the same obligations with respect to trade policy. The more highly developed countries can reasonably be expected so to manage their affairs that there is no persistent tendency to over-import. For these countries, the use of quantitative restrictions on imports should therefore be regarded as most abnormal — a procedure to be used only in case of extreme payments difficulties and after other, more normal, methods of dealing with the problem had failed. The rule for such countries might therefore be that quantitative restrictions (and of course discrimination) were to be avoided, except under a strict escape clause. This rule could however not be applied to countries which are in a chronic state of inflation. This is likely to be the case with under-developed countries which push ahead with development plans more rapidly than the resources at their disposal permit. These countries claim — and they probably need (partly for administrative reasons) — the right to use their foreign exchange resources on goods of first priority, and to use quantitative restrictions (though not of a discriminatory sort) for this purpose. If the general escape clause is drawn broadly enough to accommodate these countries it will be too broad for the others, and will unnecessarily weaken the obligations they undertake. It would therefore be desirable to separate out these two types of case and have special, fairly loose, provisions for under-developed countries and more stringent provisions for others.

2. The treatment of countries in a "persistent and extreme creditor position" is a complicated one. In our view the existence of such a position should be accepted as the sole justification for discrimination in the new trade rules. Yet it must be recognized that in a world of convertible currencies, there is no exchange advantage in discrimination; in fact there is usually an exchange loss, since normally the assumption is that lower prices prevailed in the "scarce currency" country than will have to be paid elsewhere for the goods excluded. For discrimination to achieve any worthwhile results it has to be practiced fairly generally and under convertible currency conditions would have to be highly organized. If a large number of countries discriminate against a persistent creditor they could provide each other with trading opportunities — though of an uneconomic sort — which did not previously exist. However, so long as currencies remained convertible there would be a temptation to use them to buy from the "offending" creditor country if its prices were lower. There would therefore have to be understandings to prevent this, which would not be easy to reach unless the "scarce currency" situation was so extreme that a large number of currencies again became inconvertible.

3. In considering the scarce currency problem, it should be borne in mind that the Fund Agreement has a scarce currency clause which, if implemented, authorizes members to impose exchange restrictions on the scarce currency. It would seem undesirable to set up two authorities to determine when a "scarce currency" situation exists, and since this is a financial matter the determination should be left to the Fund. The trade rules might provide, as Article XIV, Section 5(a) of the GATT now does, that countries may impose trade restrictions having equivalent effect to exchange restrictions authorized under Section 3(b) of Article VII of the Fund Agreement.

4. There are several questions relating to the permanent trade rules for developed countries which will require a great deal of further study. Since views here on these subjects have not yet crystallised, we would not expect you to raise these questions formally, but we would be interested to learn of any opinions bearing on them which may be expressed at the London meeting. These questions include:

(i) Should the ban on q.r.'s (apart from an emergency escape clause and some inevitable agricultural escape clause) be absolute, as we should greatly prefer, or will it be necessary to recognize in some formal way, that, for political reasons, even the best-intentioned countries in Europe may have to retain a few? Is the approach to this problem represented by the OEEC "negative list" the most effective means of minimizing the dangers? Would it be practicable and preferable to substitute tariffs for q.r.'s in these few cases?

(ii) What is the best, or least undesirable, form of agricultural escape clause? How far will the minimum escape clause needed for U.S. purposes go towards meeting European needs (political and otherwise) for protecting domestic agriculture. Can anything be done to limit export subsidies?

(iii) As for the emergency escape clause, is "prior approval" for its use really desirable or practicable amongst the developed or "like-minded" countries? And should the approval for its use be given by the IMF or some other body?

(b) Trade Rules in the Period of Grace

5. One of the dangers to which the United Kingdom feels exposed in making sterling convertible is that European countries will seek to earn dollars by restricting their imports from the sterling area; on the other hand, some of the European countries have expressed the fear that the United Kingdom will restrict imports from them. The maintenance of the European liberalization code disposes of both sets of fears and hence makes it easier for progress to be made to convertibility. We should therefore approve the maintenance in effect of the OEEC code. This implies acquiescing in continued discrimination against us, but in view of the British proposals regarding the long-term trade rules there would now be a terminal date on such discrimination for the countries accepting the rules.

Convertibility itself establishes a strong economic pressure in favour of non-discrimination, as all convertible currencies are equivalent to dollars. There is no exchange reason why the British, for example, should discriminate in favour of OEEC countries against dollar countries once sterling is convertible (or indeed, practicably convertible, as now) and, on the other hand, non-resident earners of sterling have no financial reason for discriminating in favour of the sterling area against dollar countries. The maintenance of the OEEC code in conditions of convertibility therefore has the effect of continuing discrimination in financial circumstances in which it is clearly inappropriate. This fact constitutes, indeed, some protection to us as the self-interest of most of the countries concerned should lead them to get on to a non-discriminatory basis of imports in a short time. It is, of course, essential that the normal forces exerted by convertibility should be allowed to operate and that there should be no wilful interference with the pressures they exert on the direction of trade, such as would be involved for example, in any attempt to slow up the process of relaxation of discriminatory import restrictions against dollar goods. This means that, though we should support the maintenance of the OEEC code in the initial period after convertibility, it would be on the understanding that countries will proceed rapidly towards dollar relaxation and that no attempt will be made to slow down this process.

Closely tied in with the question of convertibility and the removal of discriminatory trading practices are the comprehensive bilateral trading arrangements of a number of countries. These arrangements restrict trade in an uneconomic manner. Unless a determined effort is made to set aside such practices they are almost certain to considerably confine the beneficial effects of convertibility. It is also hoped that the adoption of convertibility and the removal of trade restrictions will not be accompanied by any trend toward a general increasing of tariffs, although there may be instances where specific adjustments are warranted.

(d) European Fund

It would not seem appropriate for us to make any special comment under these headings.

(e) Institutional Problems

We have supported the idea of the bridge committee between I.M.F. and GATT and continue to believe that this proposal has merit. Properly set up, it would provide a group of manageable size, consisting of operating officials (including, when appropriate, Ministers) to discuss financial and trade problems together, and seek for constructive solutions to difficulties which would recognize the responsibilities of all countries. The idea has the great merit that, by operating through the Fund and GATT, which embody the legal obligations which countries have assumed in these matters (as well as constituting, in the case of the Fund, a possible source of finance to help countries to observe the rules) any question of conflicting jurisdiction or working at cross-purposes is avoided. The idea also has the political advantage of not giving special responsibilities to an institution which is exclusive in character.

However, since the idea was put forward the attitudes of other countries towards the I.M.F.-GATT Committee have developed in a way which makes it appear uncertain that this proposal will be accepted. U.S. Treasury officials have indicated that the U.S. would find great difficulty in accepting membership. And the European countries obviously fear that the establishment of such a committee would greatly reduce the importance of OEEC, and this attitude appears at the moment to be a drag on their willingness to participate in a general movement towards currency convertibility. In the circumstances, while we should continue to express our preference for the I.M.F.-GATT idea, we should do so in a way which indicates an open mind on this organizational question, and which recognizes the attitudes of other countries.

We cannot, however, support a proposal that OEEC should be given some special responsibilities of a precise legal character in connection with the trade rules and the convertibility operation. In spite of the inclusion of the U.S. and Canada as associate members, the OEEC remains essentially a European regional organization; it is essentially indeed for this reason (though also, perhaps, because of access to an influential U.S. ear) that the Europeans value it. However, the depth of the attachment of the Europeans to the OEEC is impressive and there is a danger that the move to convertibility will be delayed if they are given the impression that the organizational arrangements in connection with such a move are designed to push OEEC aside prematurely. Moreover, there is this real point of substance in the case the Europeans make — that more progress is likely to be made in maintaining sensible trade and currency arrangements if discussions on these matters take place among countries which feel they have an important interest in world trade and which are able and willing to be guided by the same code of behaviour.

In all the circumstances the most satisfactory arrangements might be to work entirely through existing institutions — the I.M.F., GATT and OEEC. The legal responsibilities in connection with convertibility and the trade rules would belong to I.M.F. and GATT and one would hope that they would develop more intimate relationships with each other. One might also hope for an increase in the effectiveness of these institutions if there is a major world-wide movement towards freer currencies and trade.

The most important way to strengthen the Fund would be to change the character of the Executive Board so that the principal countries were represented by operating officials who had some responsibility in financial matters at home and who served as part-time Directors. This could be done without any constitutional change, merely by scheduling policy meetings of the Board at regular intervals, say 6 or 8 times a year. The change would of course require agreement among the main countries that this was how the Fund should operate.

So far as GATT is concerned, the hope would be that when the organizational provisions were changed so as to enable the U.S. to ratify the Agreement, the Secretariat would be strengthened and closer liaison established with the Fund in Washington. If the proposals are accepted by which there would in effect be two sets of trade rules — one for the under-developed countries and one for the U.S., U.K., the non-Asian Commonwealth countries, Japan and most of Europe, it will be a matter for discussion whether GATT should set up separate machinery to supervise the application of the rules by these two groups. For the reasons given earlier, this would appear desirable but the question cannot be decided now.

The OEEC would remain in existence as an organization in which the members and associate members could discuss matters of common concern. It would have no new responsibilities but no new rivals. If European countries wanted to use it to call each other to account in connection with trade arrangements, they would be free to do so; but they could not in this way by-pass GATT or the Fund. If these institutions functioned effectively one would expect to see a gradual diminution in the role of OEEC. Text ends.

*Déclaration du représentant permanent auprès du Conseil
de l'Atlantique Nord et l'OECE*

Statement by Permanent Representative to North Atlantic Council and OEEC

MINISTERIAL EXAMINATION GROUP ON CONVERTIBILITY,
LONDON, JULY 15/54

I have been instructed to make clear the position of the Canadian Government on this important subject of the permanent trade rules. There is no need for me to stress the importance of this question for my country. Canada derives a large proportion of her national income from external trade. Our total trade is greater than that of any other country except the United States and the United Kingdom. Our trade interests are world-wide.

It is true that a large proportion of our trade is conducted with two areas, namely, the United States and Western Europe, but we have had recent experience of the disadvantages of concentrating our trading interests too much in either of these two areas. Important though these trading areas are to us, we would not wish to see them emphasized to the exclusion of the interests of our trade with other parts of the world.

It follows from this that the Canadian Government consider the permanent trade rules as being conceived purely on a world-wide basis and administered by a world-wide organization. We are in favour of making use of existing organizations. We feel that they should be adapted and strengthened to meet the needs of the new situation which will arise when the currencies of certain countries become convertible. We could not contemplate having the trade rules administered by a body of which we are not a full member. Nor could we consider entrusting this task to a body which was not representative of many of the important areas with which we are desirous of expanding our trade. In other words, we can not conceive of a matter so important to our national interest as the trade rules being administered by a body which does not have world-wide representation.

The only existing organization dealing with trade which is of a world-wide character is the GATT. The articles of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade are to be reviewed by the Contracting Parties at a session which is to be held later this year. This affords the opportunity of adapting the GATT to the new situation and incorporating in the General Agreement the trade rules which will be operative in the period after the currencies of certain countries become convertible. These trade rules can be made as stringent as possible for the countries whose currencies have become convertible. There will have to be escape clauses for countries in balance of payments difficulties and whose currencies therefore remain inconvertible, but these should be kept under constant review and subject to clearly defined criteria, certain of which could be based on determinations by the International Monetary Fund. There will also have to be special provision for the underdeveloped countries, as envisaged in paragraph 15 of the United Kingdom memorandum. The membership of these underdeveloped countries in the organization administering the trade rules will, therefore, not affect the application of more stringent rules among the more limited group of "like-minded" countries, to which reference is made in the paper before us.

We believe that the GATT can be made to work, and that it can be adapted to the purpose of administering the trade rules in the new situation. What is needed is not only a review of the substantive provisions of the General Agreement, but also of the organizational provisions under which the meetings of the Contracting Parties now take place. In particular, there will be the need for a strong standing committee which can be called together on short notice. What is still more important will be the working out of effective co-operation between all of the organizations which have responsibilities in the field of international trade and finance. This applies particularly to co-operation between the GATT and the International Monetary Fund, which is the question raised under sub-paragraph (f) of paragraph 29 of the paper before us. The Fund is the only organization dealing with international payments which is constituted on a world-wide basis. We believe it is possible to work out effective means of co-operation between the GATT and the Fund.

We would also like to see more effective co-operation between the GATT, the Fund, and the OEEC in order that the aims and objectives of one organization may not be frustrated by the actions of another. Most of the countries represented around this table are either members or associate members of all three organizations. This should make it feasible to work out effective co-operation between them. We also believe it should be possible for those members of the OEEC who are not now Contracting Parties to the GATT to become members of that organization after the review of GATT takes place.

It is important that while we should aim high in the sense of bringing about as soon as circumstances permit the freest possible conditions for multilateral trade and payments, we should be realistic in realizing that we can not all at once achieve that goal. The new trade rules of GATT should, therefore, be designed to take full account of the necessities for the interim period, although giving the GATT organization authority to see that not only the basic rules but also the exceptions for the interim period are strictly adhered to. Close co-operation with the International Monetary Fund and the OEEC will be an essential element in the discharge of this responsibility to be placed upon GATT.

I shall not deal with the complicated question of the treatment of countries in a "persistent and extreme creditor position", except to say that in our view the existence of such a position should be accepted as the sole justification for discrimination when formulating the new trade rules.

Closely tied in with the question of convertibility and the removal of discriminatory trading practices are the comprehensive bilateral trading arrangements of a number of countries. These arrangements restrict trade in an uneconomic manner. Unless a determined effort is made to set aside such practices, they are almost certain to confine considerably the beneficial effects of convertibility.

It is also hoped that the adoption of convertibility and the removal of trade restrictions will not be accompanied by any trend toward a general increase of tariffs, although there may be instances where specific adjustments are warranted and may indeed be desirable as the only practical means of doing away with certain quantitative restrictions.

The field of tariffs, therefore, should not be neglected. This is a field in which GATT has pioneered, having been the first organization to sponsor tariff negotiations on a multilateral basis. The stabilization of tariffs that has resulted from the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade has been of great benefit to world commerce. When conditions are opportune, further attempts to reduce tariffs should be made under the auspices of GATT. This should go hand in hand with — but not prejudice the main objective of freeing world trade from the impediments of quantitative restrictions and other arbitrary barriers to trade.

To sum up, Mr. Chairman, the considered view of the Canadian Government is that the permanent trade rules must be of world-wide application, and must be administered by a world-wide organization. We see no possibility of transforming a purely regional body such as the OEEC into such a world-wide organization, so that we feel every effort should be made to adapt and strengthen the one existing organization that fulfils the conditions we require for the administration of the trade rules.

*Déclaration du représentant permanent auprès du Conseil
de l'Atlantique Nord et l'OEECStatement by Permanent Representative to North Atlantic Council and OEEC*

MINISTERIAL EXAMINATION GROUP ON CONVERTIBILITY,
LONDON, JULY 15/54

The code of liberalization is a matter for consideration by the Members of OEEC, but perhaps an associate member of the Organization may be permitted a few observations.

We think the code has been a good thing in securing a start, albeit on a regional basis, in the removal of quantitative restrictions. The Canadian Government has always had certain reserves about the regional character of EPU and the OEEC liberalization system. These reserves were founded on the tendency — which we feared — that progress toward a freer system of trade and payments and a viable European economy would be restricted to the potentialities of the weakest economies. We have been gratified, however, to see in the past months that both EPU and the liberalization code have not been administered with these regional objectives in mind and that it is accepted to be in the interests of all OEEC countries that each country should proceed at its own best pace in moving toward convertibility and the rationalization of its economy. It is our firmly held view that this is the right course to follow.

It is with these thoughts in mind that we approach the question of the continuation of the code in the interim period. In the interim period the problems of trade liberalization in Europe will no longer be on the same regional basis as at present. Economic forces will preclude regionalism. As soon as some currencies are made convertible, discrimination against goods from other convertible areas become meaningless. It is in the best interests of European countries to get rid of such discrimination as quickly as possible in order to reduce their import bills and rationalize their price structures. Accordingly, if this apparently irrefutable logic is accepted, the OEEC liberalization code assumes a very different aspect.

In our view, the most important feature of the code in the interim period is its non-discrimination article. In the interests of preserving European co-operation, this feature of the Code must be maintained. We realize that the acceptance of non-discrimination on the part of non-convertible countries may involve some sort term difficulties for these countries, but the alternative to non-discrimination can hardly be acceptable to them, and in our view, could not be considered in their short or long term interests. The continuation of the code with its non-discrimination article may involve measures of support for inconvertible currencies varying from country to country. The provision of this support and its administration with the clear objective of assisting the inconvertible countries to convertibility and a wider system of trade and payments will provide a difficult, but essential task for the OEEC. It is a task for which OEEC, by its nature and experience is well suited and one which will provide a challenge for the Organization as well as a test of the success of European co-operation.

To sum up our views, Mr. Chairman, they are:

1. That the liberalization code should be maintained with special reference to its non-discrimination article.
2. That whatever forms of European co-operation are necessary should be predicated on the acceptance of this principle.
3. That the OEEC in providing the forum for this difficult but most rewarding task of European co-operation should bear constantly in mind the broader efforts on a world-wide front toward the objectives of a freer system of multilateral trade and payments.

Finally, I would say that like the United States, we are anxious to continue Canada's present fruitful association with the OEEC.

OEEC MINISTERIAL EXAMINATION GROUP ON CONVERTIBILITY,
CHURCH HOUSE, LONDON, JULY 15 AND 16

Although nothing spectacular occurred during the Ministers' Deliberations in their Examination Group Meetings on July 15 and 16, they provided the necessary Ministerial approval of the line of action which had germinated in the Deputies' meetings in June. The one issue which might have given rise to a spectacular division of opinion, the organizational issue, was not discussed independently. It was put off till the end of the meeting when there was no time to discuss it. The nature of the organizational issue was clarified by the debate on the trade and payments questions but it was clearly not ripe for Ministerial pronouncements and not sufficiently urgent to require discussion.

2. The more urgent issues were those concerning trade and payments arrangements. These were discussed separately with a view to the preparation of instructions to the Deputies in reply to their questions on trade issues posed in GMC(54)3, 1st Revision, para 29 a-d, and in reply to questions on payments issues contained in paragraph 29e of the same document. The texts of these instructions were sent to you in our telegram No. 540.

Trade Issues

3. Mr. Butler (U.K. and Chairman) opened the debate on trade issues with a summary of points on which he thought members were in general agreement.

Member countries were generally agreed:

(i) on the future elimination of Quantitative Restrictions with internationally agreed exceptions;

(ii) on the policy of avoiding discrimination except in instances in which a currency had been declared scarce;

(iii) on the need for a transitional period of time after some countries had made their currencies convertible to allow policies in (i) and (ii) to be fully applied;

(iv) in the transitional period, there must be no falling back and reversion to less enlightened trade and payments arrangements than presently existed. (Mr. Butler emphasized that the U.K. regarded this as very important);

(v) that there was a need for international credit which might come from the IMF or from a Special European Fund on which the U.K. had made proposals;

(vi) that there was a need for exchange rate stability and the avoidance of competitive depreciation;

(vii) that there was a need for a forum in which trade and payments questions could be discussed together.

4. Mr. Butler went on to give his own view that much of what is needed to bring these points of general agreement into effective operation was to be found in the GATT. What was needed was a "change of heart" to make the GATT international rules work and a need to extend the effective operation of the rules over a wider area. There would also have to be a consideration of the changes needed in the international rules; this would be undertaken in the review of GATT later in the year. Mr. Butler went on to stress the U.K. view that the OEEC Code must be maintained until it is subsumed at the end of the transitional period. It was necessary to secure in the OEEC Code the principles on which all were agreed.

5. Mr. van der Kieft (Netherlands speaking for Benelux), began his remarks with a reiteration of Benelux views on the need for discussion of internal policies and payments problems in connection with the application of trade rules. Proper consultation required a good organization. Benelux felt the proper organization to undertake this task was the OEEC expanded by including the Associate Members and the British Dominions.

6. The OEEC Code was an appropriate basis for the international trade rules required after convertibility. The Organization should investigate means for making the rules more stringent on a restricted basis. A European Fund should be set up to permit the continuation of non-discrimination by inconvertible countries. QRs applied for balance of payments reasons should only be permitted after consultation and their period of application should be strictly limited. He went on to emphasize the Benelux view that any further reduction in Quantitative Restrictions depended on reductions of tariffs by high tariff countries. In fact, it might even be doubtful whether the present Benelux level of liberation could be maintained if high tariff levels were maintained.

7. Mr. van der Kieft agreed that discrimination against the dollar area should be eliminated in accordance with commitments in the GATT and the IMF. However, he said, without elaborating, that some restrictions might have to be maintained.

On the question of bilateralism, the Benelux countries felt that there was a need for concerted action to reduce bilateralism in Europe, but there was need for further study on bilateralism outside Europe. Bilateral arrangements with countries outside Europe might be unavoidable. In any case time would be required to get rid of them.

8. Mr. Krag (Denmark for Scandinavia), followed the general line taken by Benelux. He favoured an OEEC solution to the organizational problem. Discrimination should be a measure of last resort after previous discussion of remedial measures by both creditors and debtors. The OEEC Code should be continued but he emphasized that as more progress was made in the removal of QRs the more it was necessary to give closer consideration to other forms of restriction: tariffs, state trading, artificial aids etc.

9. On the question of dollar restrictions, Mr. Krag thought that the OEEC free list should in principle, be extended to dollar goods and discrimination ended. The Scandinavian countries were, in principle, opposed to bilateralism, but, on the other hand, the complete banning of bilateral arrangements might under some circumstances serve to reduce trade. There was need for further study of this question.

10. M. Petitpierre (Switzerland), felt that convertibility was essential, but care must be taken that it be achieved in conditions of stability and in conditions which permitted a continuation of economic expansion. Switzerland was in favour of maintaining OEEC as an instrument of European co-operation and as the institution for solving trade and payments problems. OEEC should be enlarged to include other like-minded countries.

11. M. Petitpierre said there were many intermediary methods of achieving convertibility and it was not essential that all countries should adopt the same methods. What was necessary was that each country should state exactly what it intends to do in order that OEEC could make appropriate international arrangements.

12. Mr. Burgess (United States Treasury), referred to the greatly improved situation and outlook in Europe since last May. He cited increases in gold reserves, increased dollar liberalization and the continuation of sound internal policies. In the U.S. the economic adjustment was proceeding normally and the present economic outlook was reassuring.

13. On the organizational issue, Mr. Burgess said that the U.S. was firmly of the belief that the OEEC should continue. The U.S. wished to maintain its association with OEEC and he hoped that Canada would do likewise. It was the U.S. view that after convertibility was achieved, reliance should be placed on existing organizations (the GATT and IMF). These should be strengthened, but there was no need to set up new committees or to superimpose an IMF/GATT Advisory Board.

14. On the question of bilateralism, the U.S. Government felt it was vitally important that convertibility should not be associated with any resurgence of bilateral agreements in Europe. Mr. Burgess said it was questionable whether the IMF should support moves to convertibility on the part of countries which continued to resort to bilateral arrangements.

15. On the question of persistent creditors, it was the U.S. view that Article VII of IMF and the relevant GATT articles should provide adequate provisions. Their application depended on good will.

16. M. Nicholaedes (Greece), agreed that discrimination against the dollar area should be ended. Speaking for his own country and for "other non-represented countries", he said that the abolition of bilateral arrangements was not possible.

17. Mr. Erhard (Federal Republic), said that in principle, his Government felt that it would be preferable if there could be world-wide trade rules administered by a world-wide organization. He did not think this was realistic; what he was concerned about was "pragmatic progress". This led him to the conclusion that trade rules should be drawn up for a more selective group of like-minded countries. The OEEC Code should be the basis for establishing these new and more stringent trade rules. Special attention must be paid to the escape clause provisions: no country should be permitted to reintroduce QRs for balance of payments reasons without prior approval. As he saw it, the position after some countries moved to convertibility should be that: (i) the Code should continue to be applied by inconvertibles; (ii) the convertible countries should increase their percentage of liberalization.

18. On the question of dollar discrimination, Mr. Erhard felt that the present divergence of treatment between Europe and the dollar area was no longer justified. Gradual progress in dollar liberalization was an essential preparatory move to convertibility.

19. Mr. Erhard said that bilateralism was incompatible with convertibility; there were, however, difficult problems in connection with OEEC countries' relations with third countries. He recommended that OEEC should study this question. Agreement should be reached in OEEC for an early elimination of bilateral agreements.

20. M. Faure (France), said his Government agreed with the objective of convertibility. It could not take the step to convertibility, however, until it had covered its risks. The French government realized that it could not hold back other countries which wished to make their currencies convertible but he expressed the hope that they would not take unilateral decisions without bearing in mind their effects on the weaker countries. In this connection he stressed the great importance he attached to the formation of a European Fund with ample resources.

21. In rebuttal to some of the views which had been expressed, Mr. Thornycroft (U.K. Board of Trade) said that the trade rules and organizational issues should not be confused. There would be plenty for OEEC as an organization to do in connection with the day to day consideration of commercial problems. The trade rules however, which must be of world-wide application would have to be the responsibility of an organization with appropriate world-wide membership.

22. On the question of the reapplication of QRs, Mr. Thornycroft reiterated the U.K. view that it is not practically possible to consult before applying QRs. Prior consultation would give rise to speculation.

23. On the question of tariffs, he said that there was "no question" of the U.K. negotiating the liberalization of QRs against tariff reductions. The U.K. was, however, prepared to continue GATT tariff negotiations with U.S. participation. With regard to bilateralism, the U.K. agreed, in general with Mr. Erhard, that in principle bilateral arrangements should be abolished, but the problems connected with their abolition needed further study which should be undertaken by OEEC. Further study at official level was also required regarding desirable changes to be introduced in the Liberalization Code.

24. Mr. Waugh (U.S.) said that the United States was not seeking the reduction of discrimination at the expense of European liberalization. It was, however, their view that the European situation had improved to such an extent that further steps should be taken to eliminate discrimination. In this connection, he hoped that OEEC could prepare a "global liberalization programme" for the next Ministerial Council.

25. On the control of deliberalization, Mr. Waugh considered that the new OEEC trade rules (i.e. the revised OEEC Code), should provide for the elimination of discrimination for convertibles, and for practical measures which would enable inconvertible countries to reduce barriers and make progress toward convertibility.

26. Mr. Waugh said that the U.S. had given considerable attention to the problem of co-operation between the GATT and the Fund. This was essential. Improved co-operation might be achieved by strengthening the administrative machinery of the GATT, and by improving the consultative machinery. (The U.S. have in mind the creation of a GATT Standing Committee in Washington). He said the U.S. would put forward concrete proposals at the next meetings of the GATT and Fund.

27. Mr. Waugh reiterated U.S. support for OEEC and, without developing his point, said that he hoped the OEEC would be given "appropriate powers". He welcomed unilateral tariff reductions arranged through consultation with OEEC (which had been suggested), but he emphasized that GATT was the principle body for tariff negotiations.

28. In connection with the debate on trade issues, I made two statements, the texts of which were sent to you under cover of our letter No. 2188 of July 20. These contained a rather forthright exposé of our views on the necessity for world-wide trade rules administered by the GATT. We felt it wise to make a strong statement in view of the strongly held and expressed views of the continental countries favouring an OEEC solution. My remarks gave rise to some disappointment among the continentals, but I think they gave useful support to the world-wide approach which had been put forward by the U.K. and U.S.

Conclusions

29. The instructions given to the Deputies recognize the requirement for world-wide trade rules but express the view that the OEEC Code of Liberalization should be maintained "at least for a transitional period during which world-wide rules would not be in full operation". This represents a defeat, in principle, for the continental countries and the OEEC solution. They have not given up yet, however. We expect that their efforts will now be directed toward the reinforcement of the OEEC Code. They reject any direct mention of the fact that it will be subsumed at the end of the transitional period. It might be suspected that their present intention would be to prolong the "transitional period" indefinitely. Although they have reluctantly accepted the principle of world trade rules, they may be expected to do their utmost to maintain the practical administration of the OEEC rules for as long as possible. This will have to be closely watched.

30. The Deputies have been instructed to suggest amendments to the Code to provide for increased liberalization. Benelux, and the Scandinavians are insisting, however, that any further progress in liberalization must be preceded by reductions of other barriers to trade, i.e. state trading, tariffs, etc. These may provide difficult negotiating problems for the Deputies. It seems unlikely that they will have any more success than they have had in the past in resolving the tariff question.

31. The Deputies are also instructed to consider "what further concrete steps could be proposed to the Ministerial Council in November for the further abolition of quantitative restrictions both on intra-European trade and on trade with the dollar area." There seems to be fairly general agreement on the inevitability (and therefore desirability) of the removal of dollar discrimination when some currencies are made convertible. It may be expected, however, that the continental countries will be wracking their brains in order to secure a quid pro quo from North America. So far, they have apparently not been able to think of a practical one on which they could insist. Although there are constant reminders of the necessity for a more liberal U.S. commercial policy, these are not put forward hopefully.

Payments Issues

32. The discussion on payments problems centred on the question of the need for a European Fund after the liquidation of EPU. There was general agreement on the need for such a fund and on the desirability of having it accessible to, and administered by all OEEC countries. The question of universal contributions to the Fund was approached with more hesitancy. So far no creditors have agreed to contribute more than their temporary rights to OEEC assets on liquidation and it appears likely that this position will be maintained. As the technical details of the proposed Fund had not received any study in OEEC, there was no conclusive debate on the subject, but a number of Ministers presented views on some of the principles which might be studied.

33. The Examination Group had before it an Italian memorandum (copies sent to you under cover of our letter No. 2119 of July 13),[†] proposing a Fund endowed with resources of at least one billion dollars ($271 million EPU assets, $229 million additional U.S. contribution, $500 million from EPU members). This proposal was not discussed seriously although M. Faure, of course, supported it strongly.

34. Following is a summary of the debate:

Mr. Erhard (Federal Republic), was in agreement with the proposal for a European Fund but he felt strongly that its charter should not include what he regarded as some of the faults of the EPU Agreement. Specifically, European Fund credit should not be granted automatically and credit should be short term credit. With regard to the assets of the Fund, he suggested they should comprise the assets of EPU on liquidation. The convertible countries need do no more than accept a temporary renunciation of their rights to EPU assets.

35. With regard to the working of the Fund, Mr. Erhard had only one suggestion to make: that it be administered in accordance with the principles of a free economic system.

36. Mr. Krag (Denmark for Scandinavia), was in favour of a European Fund open to non-convertibles and also "to countries which, disregarding difficulties, made their currencies convertible". He emphasized that the credits available to the Scandinavian countries from IMF were smaller than those available through EPU. Mr. Krag thought drawing rights from the European Fund should be made as automatic as possible.

37. Mr. Maudling (U.K.), reviewed the proposal made by his Government in their memorandum GMC(54)1. He felt that the European Fund would not require a monthly compensation mechanism as was the case for EPU. The clearing function could be taken over by the market. The assets of the Fund should be sufficient to ensure progress in liberalizing trade, but in case of difficulty the U.K. felt that countries should have first recourse to the IMF. European credits should be strictly short term credits and not fully automatic. The European Fund, in his opinion, should be modeled on the IMF.

38. The original U.K. proposal suggested that the European Fund should be reserved to non-convertible countries. They now accepted the views of others that it should be open to all EPU countries.

39. Mr. van der Kieft (Benelux), agreed with the proposal for a European Fund and was convinced that it was necessary. He agreed to the use of EPU assets on liquidation to form its resources. The Fund should be open to all EPU members but should mainly be used to support those countries which had fewer facilities elsewhere. Credit should not be automatic but should be used to encourage moves to convertibility and non-discrimination.

40. On the question of exchange rates, Mr. van der Kieft felt that this matter was adequately dealt with in the IMF rules and there was no reason to alter or supplement them. He again raised the question of the reapplication of QRs, reiterating his view that there should be prior approval before reapplication. At this point he moved sharply away from the agreed Benelux line by indicating that the IMF should be the body with responsibility for granting prior approval. "The permanent officials in Washington could make rapid decisions". Mr. Ockrent (Belgium), who was at his side, frowned and squirmed noticeably in his seat as Mr. van der Kieft uttered this Benelux heresy.

41. M. Nicholaedes (Greece), was in agreement with the U.K. proposals with one exception. He reiterated the Greek view that the OEEC countries should adopt a collective approach to the IMF in connection with their requests for credit facilities. He agreed that the official approach would have to be unilateral, but felt that OEEC might screen requirements beforehand.

42. He then referred to the Benelux position on the reapplication of QRs. He did not agree that prior approval was required before reapplication. The solution might be a provisional reapplication together with the immediate submission of a case for reapplication to the appropriate organization.

43. M. Faure (France), agreed with the proposal for a European Fund but was not prepared to discuss it until it had been studied by the Deputies. There could be no return to convertibility without a European Fund. He emphasized the necessity for a Fund with adequate resources and, at this point expressed his agreement with the Italian proposal for a Fund of $1 billion as a basis for study.

44. Mr. Stassen (FOA), was pleased to note the general agreement on the need for a European Fund which was designed to promote further liberalization, and the move to convertibility. While the precise form of the Fund would have to be worked out in the Deputies, he put forth the following tentative U.S. views:

- (i) The European Fund should be a subordinate agency of OEEC.
- (ii) All OEEC members should be members of the Fund and have access to it.
- (iii) The management should be vested in a Managing Board similar to that of EPU.
- (iv) Credit should be short term.
- (v) Credit granted by the European Fund should be in convertible currency and there should be no bilateral restrictions on its use. The European Fund should be a device for supplying credit on a multilateral basis.
- (vi) The European Fund should be regarded as a supplement and not a substitute for IMF.
- (vii) The U.S. agrees to the transfer of EPU assets to a new European Fund but only on the condition that such a new Fund could be demonstrated to provide an effective instrument for trade liberalization and progress to convertibility.

45. Mr. Stassen also expressed the view that the European Fund might provide a forum for maintaining close links between the consideration of trade, finance and internal problems. He felt that it would be a definite advantage if all OEEC members contributed to the assets of the Fund. He thought it should be possible to create a European Fund which could prevent the re-emergence of bilateralism.

Conclusion

46. The Ministers, in their instructions to the Deputies, "agreed that there should be available in Europe a source of credit administered by the OEEC whether in the form of a European Fund or otherwise, available to all Member countries in the constitution of which all should participate". They instructed the Deputies to prepare proposals.

47. The Ministers also agreed that, "it was desirable that Members should approach the IMF in order to ascertain informally what facilities the IMF is likely to offer. They also agreed that the Deputies should discuss the credit requirements of OEEC countries and the facilities likely to be available.

Future Work

48. It is expected that Ellis-Rees, Chairman of the Deputies will call a brief meeting next week to turn over formally to the Secretariat the preparatory work which the Ministers instructed the Deputies to undertake. Ellis-Rees and probably many of the other representatives will be absent on holiday from Paris for a month or six weeks. It is, therefore, unlikely that there will be further discussions on convertibil-ity issues until the second half of September and perhaps not until after the IMF meetings. The Deputies will, however, have to prepare proposals for a meeting of the Ministerial Examination Group before the next Ministerial Council which is scheduled for November.

OEEC MINISTERIAL EXAMINATION GROUP ON CONVERTIBILITY

A short meeting of the Deputies of the Ministerial Examination Group on Convertibility took place on July 29 to discuss the means of carrying out the terms of reference contained in GMC(54)5 and GMC(54)6. These documents contain the Ministerial instructions to the Deputies following their meeting in London on July 15 and 16.

2. Most of the studies to which reference was made in GMC(54)6 are already being undertaken by various committees of OEEC. Paragraph 2 instructs the Deputies to, "examine the amendments which might be made to the OEEC Code, in order to provide for an increase in liberalization and action in relation to impediments to trade other than quantitative restrictions". The Steering Board under previous mandates is giving active consideration to this problem.

3. In paragraph 3, the Ministers referred to the tariff problem indicating that, "an examination of tariff problems in the context of their general effect on intra-European and dollar area trade could usefully take place within the OEEC". The Deputies agreed that the work being undertaken in the Trade Committee on the preparation of a European Commodities List should be completed before new terms of reference are undertaken. As you know, there is a sharp division of opinion on the desirability of discussing tariffs at all in OEEC. The low tariff countries are anxious to discuss the lowering of tariffs by high tariff countries as an offset to increased liberalization. The U.K. and other high tariff countries maintain that tariffs are the responsibility of GATT and cannot be discussed profitably in a regional organization.

4. In paragraph 4, the Ministers instructed the Deputies to consider whether they can formulate a collective approach to the removal of dollar discrimination by Member countries. The Joint Trade and Payments Committee already has terms of reference dealing with this problem.

5. Paragraph 5 requests the Deputies to consider what further concrete steps can be proposed for consideration by the Council of OEEC when it meets at Ministerial level in November both on Intra-European Trade and on trade with the dollar area. The Deputies felt that this request was also covered under previous terms of reference of the Steering Board and the Joint Trade and Payments Committee.

6. In paragraph 6, the Ministers instructed the Deputies to study the conditions under which it will be possible for countries which are unable to return immediately to convertibility to continue to implement the obligations of the OEEC Code, i.e. not to discriminate against the convertible OEEC countries in the transitional period. Since the question of non-discrimination is closely linked with the credit facilities which will be available to non-convertible countries, the Deputies felt that preparatory work on this subject would not be profitable until there had been a further study of the proposal for a European Fund. They, therefore, agreed to postpone a consideration of the OEEC Code in the transitional period until their next meeting in October.

7. Paragraph 7 requests the Deputies to examine whether it is possible to lay down principles in regard to the use of bilateral agreements by Member countries. The U.K. Delegation agreed to submit a paper early in September containing their views on bilateral agreements as a basis for discussion at the next meeting of the Deputies.

8. In GMC(54)5, the Ministers requested their Deputies to prepare proposals on a European Fund. As this was originally a U.K. proposal, the U.K. Delegation offered to prepare a paper setting forth their views. The Italian Deputy also thought that his Government would wish to provide a paper on this subject. Both of these papers will probably be available early in September.

9. It was agreed that the next meeting of the Deputies should take place on October 13, 14 and 15. The Deputies made no arrangements for new studies on the Organizational question. This does not imply that the continental countries are losing their attachment to an OEEC solution. In private conversation with representatives of the Swiss and Belgian Delegations, we gathered that they still intend to support the continuance of a strong OEEC and that they hope to secure for this Organization, at least in the transitional period, a large measure of responsibility on trade questions.

10. Most of the Deputies will be on holiday for the rest of August and the early part of September. Many of them will be attending the Fund and Bank Meeting in Washington toward the end of September. It is for this reason that they were obliged to postpone the next meeting of the Deputies until mid-October.

DEPUTIES OF THE MINISTERIAL EXAMINATION GROUP ON CONVERTIBILITY

Maintenance of the OEEC Code of Liberalization in the Transitional Period

It had not been expected, prior to the Deputies' Meeting that much could be transacted on the Agenda item entitled: "The Maintenance of the Code in the Transitional Period". Most delegations, even those most concerned with the "OEEC approach" to the institutional question, had rather regretfully admitted that the discussion was premature and that the best that could be hoped for would be a provision for close liaison between OEEC and the Contracting Parties during the review session. In fact, however, an interesting debate developed which raised some of the essential problems of liaison and co-operation which will face OEEC and GATT in the transitional and final periods.

2. M. Marjolin set the tone of the discussion by stating succinctly the main preoccupations of OEEC in connection with the transitional period and the final period after some currencies are made convertible. As a point of departure he emphasized the European view that the introduction of convertibility must not be achieved at the expense of a reduction of European trade.

3. In the transitional period it was recognized that a measure of discrimination would continue; it would take time to break it down and unravel the bilateral agreements which in some cases linked countries' trading arrangements in discriminatory channels. With regard to the GATT trade rules, it was important that they should provide for the continuation of necessary elements of discrimination during the transitional period.

4. In the final period after convertibility the main question was whether OEEC could or should provide a means for developing a stricter set of trade rules, which they would enforce among themselves, than those which GATT would provide. Here Marjolin referred to the limitation on the development of strict trade rules in GATT due to the position of underdeveloped countries etc. Another related preoccupation of some European countries in connection with the final period was the possible emergence of extreme creditors (i.e. the U.S.). He was sceptical of the implementation of the IMF scarce currency clause. If this IMF clause could not be made to function it was difficult to imagine satisfactory solutions. It was possible, but most undesirable that European countries might simply be forced to discriminate illegally, or they might be forced into a general retreat from liberalization and a return to bilateral arrangements.

5. It was most important that these problems should be given some thought in OEEC before negotiations in the GATT solidified into final texts. He pointed out that there was not at present any specific mandate for a consideration of these problems although the Ministers had provided for their study in para 6 of GMC(54)6. M. Ockrent (Benelux) proposed that work should be undertaken as soon as possible on the preparation of OEEC trade rules appropriate for the transitional period when the European Fund would come into operation. He clearly emphasized that the new OEEC rules would have to be in conformity with the new GATT rules, but they would also permit a higher and stricter level of enforcement than would, in his view, be possible in GATT.

6. Ockrent's idea, of course, is that OEEC, with stricter trade rules to enforce, would become the operative organization in European trade matters during the transitional period. If this were accepted the OEEC would, on the financial side, have a European Fund to operate and on the trade side, a set of trade rules. Thus, the future of OEEC would be assured at least for the transitional period — and transitional periods have a habit of prolonging themselves.

7. Ockrent also has views — though less explicit ones — on the final period. He would like to have a set of OEEC trade rules which would become operative for Member countries only when they invoked one of the GATT escape clauses. The Belgian (and Swiss and Scandinavian) view is that the revised GATT will have such wide escape provisions that almost any country will, if it wishes, be in a position to invoke one of them. If there is large scale invocation of escape clauses in GATT among European countries and there are no OEEC trade rules to fall back on to handle the day to day problems of European trade, the derogating countries will find themselves “in the void”. Therefore, the Belgians, who have little faith in GATT, wish to study the question of “second string” trade rules as soon as possible pari passu with the review session of GATT.

8. Bauer (Switzerland), Cattani (Italy), Müller-Armack (Germany) and Calvet (France) supported Ockrent's proposals for preparatory work on the OEEC trade rules.

9. Rowan (U.K.) intervened to point out why it was difficult for his Government to agree to proceed in the near future with negotiations on the revision of the OEEC code. (He took it that the Belgian proposal referred specifically to the transitional period). In the first place the U.K. could not carry on two sets of trade negotiations at the same time (i.e. in GATT and OEEC) as the same people would be involved. Secondly, he felt that any serious work on the OEEC Code appropriate for the transitional period would have to await the results of the review session of GATT. The U.K. was, however, in full agreement that this work should be done at the right time and they attached as much importance as other European countries to the maintenance of the OEEC Code in an appropriate form during the transitional period.

10. Christiansen (Denmark for Scandinavia) raised the question of the problem of extreme creditors during the transitional period. Having failed to make any headway in dealing with this problem in the context of the proposals for the European Fund (see our Letter No. 3046 of October 18)† he proposed that special consideration be given to the position of extreme creditors in connection with the OEEC trade rules appropriate for the transitional period. He had in mind provisions requiring extreme creditors to relax their import policies.

11. Müller-Armack (Germany) spoke against this Scandinavian proposal. Rowan (U.K.) pointed out that after convertibility is introduced countries will have to look at their balance of payments in their totality and not on a regional basis. It was therefore not possible to consider regional trade rules which would discriminate against countries with, presumably, regional extreme creditor positions. It was well known that the U.K. had made proposals for dealing with the question of extreme creditors in the final period, namely that the IMF should operate under Article 7(3) and not Article 7(1) of its articles of agreement (the scarce currency article). This would tend to tighten the provisions. He saw no acceptable regional method of carrying out the Danish objectives in the period after convertibility.

12. It was finally decided that it would not be appropriate to give special mandates for studying the OEEC Code at the present time. Marjolin, however, pointed out that arrangements had been made for the closest liaison between the GATT and OEEC during the review session (see our letter No. 2848 of September 29).[†] Under these arrangements a special group, composed mainly of chairmen of the principal committees concerned with trade and payments, has been constituted to watch developments in GATT and their implications for OEEC. This group could bear in mind the questions of the future revision of the OEEC Code and its application in the transitional period. If problems arose during the course of the review session, they could be brought to the attention of the OEEC Council at short notice. The Deputies felt that these arrangements for close liaison were satisfactory.

13. The implications of this debate are of some interest. It gave an explicit indication that the European continental countries, although they have not been given a chance to discuss the organizational question (see our letter No. 1737 of June 4) since last June, have nevertheless kept their former ideas on the necessity of preserving for OEEC, in the transitional period and if possible afterwards, some effective control over trade policy. Specific problems in this connection may emerge in Geneva and Paris during the review session.

DEPUTIES OF OEEC EXAMINATION GROUP ON CONVERTIBILITY OCT. 13-15

Liberalization of Impediments to Intra-European Trade

In discussing this subject the Deputies had before them a draft Steering Board report which, when in its final form, will be presented to the next Ministerial Council probably in December. The draft report SBC(54)18 described the progress which the Steering Board has made on various impediments to Intra-European Trade: QRs, Customs tariffs (see our Letter No. 3050 of October 18)[†] and State trading.

2. The Deputies had only to take note of this work, but the occasion was used by low tariff countries, viz. Benelux and Scandinavia to insist on the importance of linking future reductions in QRs to freer tariff policies. We also used the occasion to make a statement indicating our approval of the Steering Board's draft proposals for new measures of intra-European liberalization as an important step toward the final achievement of convertibility. A copy of our statement is attached. In making this intervention we had in mind the desirability of balancing a later statement on dollar import restrictions with an indication of our interest in other aspects of the Organization's progress in dealing with trade impediments. As you will see from our statement, we also felt it would be useful to counteract the growing tendency for European creditors to insist on full reciprocity when their reserve positions justify more liberal commercial policies which would serve to prepare their economies for moves toward the wider system of trade and payments.

3. Shearer, the U.S. Representative, also pointed up the importance his government attached to new measures of intra-European liberalization. He also took advantage of the occasion to pass on some elements of a conversation he had had the previous day with Mr. Clarence Randall (who, he said was in Paris on "private" business — he refused to be drawn out on what the private business was. You may recall that Randall made a private trip to Paris in advance of the European hearings of the Randall Commission¹¹ to discuss its work). Shearer's intention was to counteract the impression which many European representatives brought away from the recent IMF Meetings, that the Administration in Washington was losing interest in the Randall Commission's recommendations and the legislation required to implement them. Privately, Shearer attributed this "false" impression to the ineptitude of people like Burgess and Waugh.

4. Shearer had received Randall's permission to quote him to the effect that the recommendations of the Randall Report were to receive a "first priority" in the 1955 session of Congress. Randall, himself has been retained to help in the work, and he will help prepare the economic sections of the President's message to Congress and the hearings thereafter. Shearer also passed on an interesting bit of gossip

¹¹ Le 14 août 1953, le président a nommé Clarence B. Randall pour diriger la Commission de la politique économique étrangère. Le rapport de la Commission a été présenté au président Eisenhower et au Congrès le 23 janvier 1954. Voir/On August 14, 1953, the President appointed Clarence B. Randall to chair the Commission on Foreign Economic Policy. The Commission's report was transmitted to President Eisenhower and Congress on January 23, 1954. on the manner in which the decision was taken (at a White House breakfast) not to proceed with implementing legislation this year. He said that Eisenhower had indicated that he was willing to put the whole force of the Administration behind the implementing legislation during the then current session. It was on Randall's advice that he decided to postpone it in order to give time for adequate hearings and to build up public opinion. Shearer stressed that there was no change in the Administration's desire to implement the recommendations of the Randall Report.

Statement by Permanent Representative to North Atlantic Council and OEEC

MEETING OF DEPUTIES OF THE MINISTERIAL EXAMINATION GROUP
ON CONVERTIBILITY, OCTOBER 13-15

Item IV(1) — Increase in Liberalization SBC(54)18

Mr. Chairman,

It is with much regret that the Canadian Government has learned over the past few months of the hesitations and fears of some Commonwealth and European countries in connection with the bold and clearcut steps which we felt were timely, appropriate and necessary if full advantage were to be taken of the current situation — a situation which favours concrete moves toward a wider system of trade and payments.

Because of the slackening of the sense of urgency about taking these broad decisions, it is more than ever necessary that the impetus toward creating the ideal conditions, in which the broader decisions become obvious, should not be slackened. The present conditions of general expansion in Europe, the increasing reserves of the EPU area as a whole, the indications of a resurgent economy in the United States and Canada provide the basis for new and far-reaching preparatory steps to a wider system. It is unthinkable that the opportunity which now presents itself should be lost.

It is therefore with great satisfaction, Mr. Chairman, that we have read the suggestions of the Steering Board for increased liberalization in Europe and the proposals regarding future consideration of the other important impediments to the free exchange of goods. It is our hope that these proposals will meet with support.

We should like to say a few words about Quantitative Restrictions and the regional bargaining system which has been in operation since the Liberalized Code was established. During the period when reserves in Europe were generally low, it was understandable that Member countries should weigh carefully the trade advantages which they might expect to receive from other countries against those which they might offer to them. It was also understandable that less consideration was given to the beneficial internal effects for a country which granted freer access to its market. Now, however, some countries with measurably stronger reserves and balance of payments positions might do well to consider closely the advantages of moving more quickly than strict reciprocity would permit.

It may be well to remember that economic leadership is required in Europe as well as in North America. Countries in more advantageous positions in Europe have a key responsibility, proportionate to their trade responsibilities, but none the less real, in maintaining the impetus of the move toward the wider system.

It is our view that new measures of intra-European liberalization, as a first objective, are an important and urgent preparatory step toward the achievement of full convertibility. These measures must, of course, be taken in step with others directed at the elimination of discrimination — and we shall have more to say about this matter later. In order to take full advantage of the present favourable economic climate, it is our hope that, in the field of quantitative restrictions, the old bargaining procedures of enforced regionalism may give way to some degree to new and broader approaches so that full advantage can be taken of the current possibilities for trade liberalization.

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE CODE OF LIBERALIZATION AND THE GATT RULES

You will recall that one of the subjects discussed at the meeting of the Deputies of the Ministerial Examination Group on Convertibility last October 13, 14 and 15, was the relationship between the Code of Liberalization and the GATT rules. Following this discussion, however, no mandate was given to any body of the Organization to study the problem. The U.K. position on the relationship was that the GATT rules should be worked out first and then OEEC should consider the relationship of its own Code to the GATT rules. The continental countries on the other hand feel that both should be studied at the same time and that provision should be made in the GATT rules for the continuation of the OEEC Code in the transitional period, and perhaps in the period after the full application of the GATT rules although this has never been made clear.

2. At the meeting of the OEEC-GATT Co-ordination Group on November 3, this question was raised again and it was decided informally that Baron Snoy, who attended the meeting, should, in his capacity of Chairman of the Steering Board, bring the matter to the attention of that body.

3. The Steering Board which met on November 4, 5 and 6, was seized with the question of the relationship between the Code of Liberalization and the GATT rules and at the insistence of the Belgians, drew up a short report — C(54)292 (six copies are attached) setting out its views on the matter. Paragraph 3 of the report reads as follows:

In the event of the strengthening of the GATT Rules prohibiting before the expiry of any adequate transition period all discrimination between Member countries and the CONTRACTING PARTIES, the OEEC Member countries might find themselves faced with the following dilemma: either they would be compelled to withdraw from intra-European liberalization because they would be incapable of extending the same measures to all the other CONTRACTING PARTIES to the GATT, or they would be placed in an illegal situation with regard to the GATT Rules. To forestall this danger, the Board considers that very close liaison should be maintained between the GATT and the OEEC so that the special position of countries which are members of both OEEC and GATT could, if necessary, be taken into consideration in the new GATT Rules. It is the Board's conviction that the strengthening of the GATT Rules ought not to result in losing the advantages gained and in causing a setback to European trade, as would almost certainly be the case if those Rules made no provision for the position of the OEEC Member countries, not all of whom would probably be able to extend the whole of the liberalization measures taken in Europe throughout the world and in particular to North America, until after the elapse of a sufficiently long transition period.

4. The report was presented to the Council at short notice on November 9, and the Benelux, Swiss and German Delegations fought hard to have it accepted without delay on the grounds that the Board was merely suggesting that the Council should appeal to Member Governments, if necessary, to give requisite instructions to their Delegations at GATT in order to forestall the dangers mentioned in para 3. Ellis-Rees, the Chairman, was not prepared to discuss the paper on such short notice but it was agreed that a Council meeting would be called on Friday, November 12, to do so if any Delegation felt unable to accept the text.

5. The urgent attention given to this subject in the Steering Board coupled with the attempt of the Belgians and the Swiss to rush it through Council in order that it might influence GATT Delegations of OEEC countries, is an indication of the strength of the continental countries' desire to maintain all the advantages of regionalism when the move to convertibility takes place. They are not as yet prepared to accept the principle that convertibility may imply some change in trade patterns. They are certain to do their utmost to prolong the transitional period for as long as possible and to endeavour to retain as much authority over trade rules in OEEC as possible.

OEEC/GATT RELATIONS DURING REVIEW SESSION

Mr. Hooton was in Geneva for a meeting of GATT delegations of OEEC countries on Saturday, November 13. The purpose of the meeting was to exchange views on the policy of OEEC in relation to the revision of the general agreement. Mr. Cohen (United Kingdom) was in the Chair.

2. As an introduction, Mr. Lintott (OEEC Secretariat) outlined the work which was currently being undertaken by OEEC which is closely related to and affected by the revision of GATT. We have reported fully on these matters in previous communications.

3. Mr. Suetens (Belgium) then introduced the main subject for discussion — that of the relationship between the OEEC liberalization code and the trade rules of the general agreement. He referred to paragraph five of the amendment to GATT Article XII, which had been prepared by the Benelux Ministers (L/271). The object of this amendment would be to enable OEEC countries to apply among themselves stricter trade rules than might be agreed among GATT countries. The Benelux countries felt that although this amendment was primarily appropriate for the transitional period it might also apply to the permanent period when there might be motives for envisaging a special system for the OEEC group of countries. He emphasized, however, that the Benelux countries had no wish to establish a closed system of preference and their wish was to extend the benefits of regional negotiations to non-members as well as member countries of OEEC.

4. Mr. Larre (France) envisaged two possibilities:

(1) To revise GATT Articles XII and XIV, making them rigid for all contracting parties. He felt, however, that there was little likelihood of the 35 GATT countries reaching an agreement and there was a danger that an attempt to liberalize in GATT on a world-scale would lead to a multiplicity of escape clauses and waivers;

(2) To maintain the GATT provisions substantially unchanged and to focus efforts towards increased liberalization of the OEEC. The OEEC countries were already far advanced on the way to liberalization. It might be desirable to try to build on this successful nucleus and to try to add to the number of countries participating in the OEEC and extend the scope of its liberalization.

5. Although the first alternative was more universal and consequently more satisfactory from the point of view of principle, the second was more realistic and was the one favoured by France. The French Government was prepared to discuss the review of GATT by either method but in practice they would favour the Benelux proposal.

6. Mr. Christides (Greece) and Mr. Ferlesch (Italy) also spoke in favour of the Benelux proposal.

7. Mr. Cohen (United Kingdom) tried to get the meeting to distinguish between the two periods envisaged in the move towards convertibility:

(1) The current and transitional period;

(2) The permanent period. During the current and transitional period, all OEEC countries were agreed that there should be no reduction in liberalization in Europe. This had been agreed by the ministerial examination group in July and elaborated in the Steering Board Paper, C(54)292, recently confirmed by the OEEC Council. The manner in which the present provisions of GATT were applied gave OEEC countries the amount of freedom they required. The amendment suggested in paragraph five of Benelux proposal would thus be necessary in the transitional period only on the hypothesis that the present GATT rules were tightened up.

8. With regard to the permanent period, problems that would arise in OEEC called, as the Steering Board Paper pointed out, for a study in that organization before it would be possible for the OEEC countries to take a position in GATT. The OEEC would have to consider the extent to which, if OEEC wished a discriminatory code for the permanent period, they would need to provide escape clauses in the GATT. In the United Kingdom view no such clauses were needed; the minimum standard applied to OEEC member countries to each other would be such as could be extended to other countries. It was necessary to reemphasize, however, that there was as yet no firm OEEC position on the permanent period. It would be a mistake to let the position become crystallized in the GATT to a point where Ministers would repudiate positions taken. It was important, however, not to take up positions in advance of the decisions by the Ministers in Paris.

9. The next OEEC ministerial meeting is in mid-January.

10. With regard to the transitional period, it was agreed that the present rules of GATT were adequate to permit continued progress in OEEC on liberalization; if there were no proposals to change them (i.e. tightening them up) there would be no need to introduce the escape suggested by Benelux. (Mr. Suetens agreed with this). If, however, they should be tightened, an escape clause on the lines suggested by Benelux might be necessary.

11. With regard to the permanent period it was agreed OEEC in Paris should proceed to consider whether member countries should limit themselves, in their code, to non-discrimination in their trade with one another or should extend the benefits to all contracting parties. They should also consider what limitation they should apply in their trade with one another and how far they could afford to have discrimination in import programmes in the context of convertibility when there would be strong reasons for adopting non-discriminatory trading policies. It was agreed that until the OEEC Ministers, at their meeting in January, had given clear instructions regarding the long-term trade rules there could be no common OEEC line in the GATT and that countries would have to act on their own initiative. It was also agreed that, in the meanwhile, the GATT should not be precluded from coming to grips with the issues involved.

12. There are two important implications of the conclusions of the meeting. Firstly, the United Kingdom succeeded in narrowing down the problems relating to the relationship between OEEC and GATT rules to one specific point; the question of regional discrimination in the final period. Secondly, the question of deciding whether the OEEC as an organization can arrive at a common view on the question of discrimination in the final period is one which must be decided in OEEC. The United Kingdom has gained the assurance of Benelux that they will not press their amendment in GATT until the OEEC Ministers have taken a decision on the issue. The debate on this question will go on simultaneously in Geneva and Paris and we have made arrangements to keep in close touch with our GATT delegation so that we can take a similar line in both organizations.

13. It was decided to hold another meeting of OEEC delegations in Geneva in the middle of December.

OEEC/GATT RELATIONS DURING REVIEW SESSION

In general we agree with you that the draft report is a good one. It follows quite closely the British approach, with which we are pretty much in agreement. There are, however, one or two points in the report about which we are not entirely happy. In one instance we feel that the unequivocal language of the British paper has been rephrased to satisfy some of the more restrictionist Europeans, thereby losing some of its "positiveness".

In other cases, while it is difficult to take exception to the actual wording, it is apparent that the Working Group has attempted to plaster over some rather wide divergences of opinion. We foresee that in the course of the debate the underlying differences in basic approach will become even more apparent. In these circumstances, if an attempt is made to get an agreed line, we fear that there will result a further watering down of the principles.

We believe that you have at one time or another been adequately briefed on all of the points covered in the draft report. However we do think it might be useful for you to have our views on these points in the report where we have some doubts:

(1) The last sentence in para. 5 is so worded that it could be interpreted as covering with a general blessing not only the worthy aim of extending world-wide liberalization of trade to the same degree that has been reached on an intra-European basis within OEEC, but also the less worthy Belgian position as reported in para.3 of your telegram 1000 of Nov. 18. As you know, our position is that after the termination of a transitional period after C-day, the trade rules should permit no discrimination, except such as may be authorized under a scarce currency clause. The transition from intra-European to world-wide trade liberalization is bound to have some effect on the pattern of European trade, but we could not agree that this is a sufficient reason for delaying the transition.

Later paragraphs in the report (e.g. paras. 8 and 11) are more positive in stating that the complete removal of discrimination is necessary, but even these more positive statements are qualified perhaps to an unnecessary extent, for example, para. 12 talks of the necessity for a transitional period after C-day during which discriminatory restrictions would be removed, but makes no mention of the desirability of dismantling as many of these q.r's as possible before C-day in order to make the ultimate step to convertibility as easy as possible.

The concern of the U.S. Delegation about a waiver by GATT for the French import tax, reported in para. 5 of your telegram 1043 of Nov. 25† is another example of what we think is an unsatisfactory attitude towards European liberalization. We have, as you know, not objected to the increased discrimination against us involved in the OEEC countries liberalizing imports from each other without at the same time liberalizing imports from Canada. However, the French tax worsens not only our relative but also our absolute position in the French market. In a sense, it pushes onto Canada and other non-European countries part of the costs of France allowing the import of more European goods. We do not regard intra-European trade realization as so important an objective that we are willing to accept this position.

In summary, although it would be difficult to take issue with the actual wording of the draft report, we are not convinced that all the member countries of OEEC are going to interpret the words in the positive manner we would like to see.

(2) We do not consider that the draft report deals adequately with the problem of bilateral agreements. As we see it, some provision for bilateral agreements in the permanent trade rules is probably necessary because of the particular methods of state trading employed by the Soviet bloc. But any provision must exclude the possibility of discrimination.

The great danger is that some countries will try to extend any provision for bilateral trading to permit them to make bilateral arrangements where they are not dictated by necessity, as in the case of the Soviet bloc. European countries have a tendency to argue that bilateral arrangements are necessary with Latin America, for example. We believe that if they refused to agree to such bilateral arrangements the Latin American countries would be isolated and would have to accept a multilateral system of trade. The French attitude towards bilateral trade is particularly retrograde, but they are not the only offenders.

We are afraid that para. 20 of the draft report is unduly soft. It is apparent that there has been an attempt to reach a compromise with the French. But we feel that the French will not be satisfied and that the real case against bilateral trading will have been weakened by this unsuccessful attempt at compromise.

(3) The sentence in square brackets in para. 43 of the draft report seems to suggest that there has been a further weakening in the British attitude towards flexible rates. Our opinion is that convertibility without flexible rates is not likely to be successful, at least as far as the U.K. is concerned, and we therefore deplore this growing tendency to think in terms of fixed rates. However, this is very delicate issue, and we do not consider it advisable to express an opinion at this time and in this context.

(4) We are interested to see in para. 45 further evidence of a desire on the part of European countries for some method of bringing collective and formal pressure to bear on the U.S. to adopt good creditor policies. Presumably the Europeans hope that some scheme can be worked out in connection with the rearrangement of relations between GATT and the IMF which will give them the right to review the policies of creditor countries, as is done in OEEC, to make recommendations to those countries for modifications in their policies, and as a last resort to give formal blessing to discrimination on scarce currency grounds.

We do not intend that these comments should necessarily be used as the basis for interventions by you. In the case of point (3) (exchange rates) we consider that it would be most inappropriate for any Canadian intervention to be made. The ideas referred to in point (4), particularly on the organizational side and on the way in which the scarce currency clause would be operated, have not crystallized sufficiently to make it appropriate for us to make any comments in the OEEC forum. We will leave it up to you to decide whether interventions in connection with discrimination and bilateral trading would serve any useful purpose.

It seems apparent that in this report on convertibility an attempt is being made by the Europeans to reach some measure of agreement on the positions which they should collectively adopt in the GATT meetings in Geneva. The real discussions on the substantive points in the report will take place in GATT, and we prefer to make our stand in the wider and, we consider, more appropriate forum. If it would help the Europeans in clarifying their own thinking to know the Canadian position, we would have no objection to your reporting to them the position taken by our Delegation in Geneva on the points covered in the draft report. But we do not want you to get drawn into a drafting debate in OEEC.

DEPUTIES OF MINISTERIAL EXAMINATION GROUP ON CONVERTIBILITY,
DECEMBER 7-8

The Deputies meeting was entirely devoted to a paragraph by paragraph consideration of GMC(54)13, containing the ministerial examination group's report to the OEEC Ministerial Council. We are reporting by letter on some of the more important positions taken in the discussion. A drafting group will meet next week to redraft the report in the Light of Deputies comments.

2. With regard to commercial problems, the most important debate centred on the question of discrimination in the period after the full application of the new GATT rules. The Steering Board had given preliminary consideration to this point during the previous week but had not reached any final conclusion. You will recall that this question had been referred back to OEEC for decision by the meeting of OEEC representatives in Geneva on November 13 (see our telegram No. 1000). No progress was made at the Deputies meeting; it was decided to await the final views of the Steering Board which meets again on December 21.

3. The United Kingdom, United States and we gave strong statements indicating that a provision for regional discrimination after full application of GATT rules was unacceptable. The continental countries led by France, Benelux and Switzerland spoke strongly in favour of a statement in para 17 which provides that, "the code should continue to regulate the conduct of trade between member countries after the re-establishment of convertibility and until equally stringent rules of worldwide application have come into force". The United Kingdom wished to replace the words "equally stringent" by "effective". The continental countries have not retreated from their firmly held view that a provision for regional discrimination under certain circumstances should be written into the permanent GATT trade rules. We doubt whether the Steering Board will be able to resolve this point finally and it may be that OEEC as an organization will not, as had been hoped, be able to adopt a concerted view on it at the review session.

4. In view of your instructions, we did not enter into the drafting debate but we did make a statement pointing up the importance of securing strong GATT rules and the consequent desirability of OEEC countries giving every support to this end in Geneva. We coupled this point with a statement of our position on discrimination in the final period and the reasons why it was unrealistic to seek to provide for regional discrimination in a convertible world when effective worldwide rules are fully operative.

5. Calvet (France) took a very active part in the debate. He regarded the commercial section of the report as useless in that it attempted to summarize in a few paragraphs and in loose language, problems which are the subject of the closest negotiation in Geneva. He reserved the French Government's position on the entire section and said he could give only general approval to its contents. The purpose of most of the French interventions was to preserve complete freedom of movement for their GATT delegation.

6. On the payments section the most interesting debate centred on the question of exchange rates. The United Kingdom insisted that its views on exchange rate policy not be included in the report in view of political and economic repercussions. Rowan gave the United Kingdom view that exchange rate policy was one for individual decision and not for concerted and agreed policy. The United Kingdom intended to retain its freedom of action to allow the rate to fluctuate but it was the intention of the United Kingdom Government, although they were not prepared to accept any commitment, to maintain a relatively stable rate. This view did not meet with the approval of the continental countries which were unanimous in their wish for a commitment to maintain fixed rates. The continental countries insisted that they be permitted to state this view in the report.

7. A debate of less interest to us developed over the method of transferring the residual assets of EPU on liquidation to the proposed European fund. This is a highly technical question which involves points of equity in sharing the burden for the provision of resources of the new fund. Different countries are favoured under different possible methods. The main question of principle is whether the union should be liquidated according to previously agreed provisions or whether at some level the union's creditors should renounce their rights to the residual assets and agree to their transfer to the European fund. The Ministers in January will have to take a decision on this point — or agree to leave the question open for further study by the Managing Board.

8. The debate on organizational questions was very brief as the Deputies were pressed for time. There was agreement that the presentation in Section III was, in general, suitable for presentation to Ministers as a basis for discussion. Although the Ministers made specific decisions on trade and payments questions last July, they have not as yet made any pronouncements on the organizational problem. It was therefore felt that it was not essential for the Deputies to attempt to prejudge the ministerial discussion on this issue.

9. A drafting group will meet next week to consider a redraft of the report. It is hoped that it will not be necessary to bring the Deputies back to Paris before the ministerial group meets on January 12. If there are insoluble objections to the new draft, however, the Deputies may have to reassemble early in January.

DEPUTIES OF MINISTERIAL EXAMINATION GROUP IN CONVERTIBILITY

The Working Group of the Ministerial Deputies on Convertibility met on December 15 and 16, and with considerable difficulty produced a revised report (GMC(54)13 second revision) of which six copies have been sent to you by air bag on December 27 under cover of transmittal slip No. 3804. This text will not be considered again by the Deputies, but will go direct to the Ministerial Group on Convertibility meeting January 12.

2. The chief points of dispute were the following:

- (a) Trade rules after convertibility (para 10).
- (b) The elimination of quantitative restrictions (para 14).
- (c) Scarce currencies (para 17).
- (d) Exchange rate policies (para 23).
- (e) Duration of the European Fund (para 31).
- (f) Resources of the European Fund (para 35).

3. The positions taken by the various delegations on these points did not change from those described in our telegram under reference and in our letter No. 3717 of December 16.† France put in a reservation of paragraphs 11 to 15 inclusive (trade rules, elimination of quantitative restrictions, and reduction of other barriers). Switzerland reserved its position on the scarce currencies.

4. The most difficult compromise of all turned out to be that on scarce currencies (para 17) because the United Kingdom delegate, acting on very rigid instructions, insisted that the scarcity of a currency which would entitle a country to adopt discrimination must be related to world shortage and not to a declaration of scarcity based on the inability of the I.M.F. to supply that currency. The United States was equally insistent that the right to discriminate must be subject to the currency having been declared scarce under international rules. These two attitudes obviously have relation to the present discussions of the position and functions of the I.M.F. with which you will be more familiar than we. The text finally adopted set out the disagreement.

5. The paragraphs on trade rules which were of particular interest to us, have been considerably watered-down. The question of the relation between GATT and OEEC rules is now dealt with as follows: "The code should continue until trade rules, of such a kind that their coming into force does not involve a retrogression in the liberalization of trade between member countries, have been agreed on a world-wide basis". This text is not wholly satisfactory, but seems to be the utmost that the European countries are prepared to accept.

6. The elimination of quantitative restrictions is dealt with in paragraphs 13 and 14. Paragraph 13 states that "The objective must be to get rid of all restrictions unless there are balance of payments emergencies such as would genuinely warrant recourse to the escape clauses". Paragraph 14 goes on as follows: "This is not, of course, to say that every kind of quantitative restriction will be removed. Special exceptions may be permitted by international agreement but, apart from these, the objective must be that defined in paragraph 13 above. It would be unrealistic, however, to assume that all countries could agree to remove their restrictions immediately one or more major currencies became convertible, since this change would necessarily involve important readjustments in their economies. It would be more practical, therefore, for countries to agree that they will work progressively towards the establishment of the new régime by removing quantitative restrictions not covered by the special exceptions mentioned above over a period which should not be unduly long, and that they will collaborate internationally, so as to make the new principles fully effective at the end of that time."

7. You will note that the period during which countries are to work towards the removal of quantitative restrictions is not now specifically limited, it being said merely that such a period should not be "unduly long".

8. In accordance with your instructions we did not enter into the drafting debate on this report. If you wish us to make a statement when the report comes up for consideration again, we should be grateful for your further instructions well before January 12 when the ministerial group will meet. Participation in the debates and drafting sessions so far indicates that there is very little possibility of securing any major revision in the text. We would suggest therefore that if any Canadian statement is to be made it should be on general lines only.

PROPOSED TRADE NEGOTIATIONS WITH SPAIN AND PORTUGAL

Consideration was given by Cabinet last December to the visit of an official Canadian Government trade mission headed by the Minister of Public Works to Portugal, Spain, Italy, and Greece. The question arises as to what preparations should be undertaken in advance of such a visit to facilitate the improvement of trade relations with the countries concerned, and in particular to increase salt cod exports to these countries. The present Memorandum indicates that there exist possibilities of improving Canada's trade relations with Portugal and Spain and of expanding the opportunities in those markets for exports of Canadian salt cod.

2. Since 1952, when facilities for the sale of Newfoundland salt cod in payment for sterling came to an end, Newfoundland's salt cod exports to the Mediterranean markets have been on a dollar basis and have faced increasing difficulties. Newfoundland salt cod sales to the Mediterranean markets which, prior to Confederation, represented over 40% of Newfoundland's salt cod exports, have declined sharply in recent years due largely to import and exchange control measures maintained by those countries. Shipments to the Mediterranean area fell from 47.5 million lbs in 1950 to 16.5 million lbs in 11 months of 1953.

3. While the fishing industry of Newfoundland is gradually being diversified, about two-thirds of all fishermen (involving about 20% of the total population) are still dependent on the production of salt cod. Further, the loss in the Mediterranean markets has the effect of diverting salt cod shipments to the Western hemisphere markets and results in a weakening of prices for salt cod for all Eastern Canada.

4. In an effort to maintain salt cod exports to the Mediterranean area, the Canadian Government has:

(1) Used its good offices in recent years to assist the trade in its private negotiations with Portuguese importers and licensing authorities;

(2) Entered into a special understanding with the Spanish Government in 1952 for the establishment of an exchange quota for the purchase of Canadian salt cod in return for removal of the Canadian duty on olives;

(3) Conducted annual negotiations with the Italian Government for the allocation of dollar exchange.

While these ad hoc measures have helped to market salt cod, they have failed to achieve an adequate volume and to provide an assured basis for this trade, and have not prevented uncertainties each year during the season when shipments are made.

5. The problem for salt cod exports is somewhat different in character in each of the Mediterranean countries. In the case of Italy and Greece there would appear to be no particular opportunity for formal trade negotiations at this time. It is considered, however, that the difficulties in Portugal and Spain stem largely from governmental regulation in those countries and that the position for Canadian salt cod exports might be improved through intergovernmental negotiations.

6. The objective of the proposed negotiations with Portugal and Spain would be to sell more salt cod in these markets. At this stage, it is felt that the first objective in Portugal and Spain should be to obtain commitments for the non-discriminatory treatment of Canadian salt cod. Failing this, the objective should be to obtain commitments for an adequate minimum import quota for Canadian salt cod on a continuing basis.

7. It is proposed that these objectives should be combined with the negotiation of new direct trade agreements with Portugal and Spain to replace the pre-war United Kingdom Treaties which now govern Canada's commercial relations with these countries. On general grounds it is considered desirable to secure independent and improved trade agreements with these countries providing, of course, that they are willing to enter into formal trade agreements with Canada. Furthermore, the recent establishment of diplomatic relations between Canada and Spain and the conclusion of United States economic agreements with Spain would make this an appropriate time for reviewing Canadian-Spanish commercial relations. While most-favoured-nation tariff treatment is exchanged under the present Treaties, certain Spanish colonies in Africa and the Portuguese colonies in Africa and Asia are not covered by the terms of these Treaties, and imports into Canada from these possessions are subject to General Tariff rates. The proposed trade agreements with Portugal and Spain (including their overseas territories) would be along standard most-favoured-nation lines, and would include provisions for the non-discriminatory treatment as between imports from dollar sources.

8. In addition to the extension of most-favoured-nation treatment to the colonies, Canada can offer Spain and Portugal new tariff concessions on some of their principal exports to Canada. These are items such as olives, olive oil, cork and cork products, almonds, anchovies, and spices. While these commodities are not of special importance in Canada's trade and are not competitive with domestic products, it is felt that they would provide an adequate basis for the kind of negotiations contemplated and that they would be of substantial interest to the countries concerned. In most of these items Spain and Portugal are our chief suppliers — they are not items therefore which have much value in GATT negotiations (neither Spain nor Portugal is a member of GATT).

9. The extension of most-favoured-nation treatment to the colonies, while not of much interest to Spain, would be a valuable concession to Portugal. The difference between the General Tariff rate and the most-favoured-nation rate is significant on a number of the products of the Portuguese colonies such as coffee, copra, cocoa, and nuts. Since Canada imports these items in substantial quantities from other countries receiving most-favoured-nation treatment, it would seem that the granting of similar treatment to the Portuguese territories would open up considerable opportunities for them to sell in this market.

Recommendations

(a) In view of the above considerations, it is recommended that Cabinet authorize the initiation at an early date of negotiations for trade agreements with Portugal and Spain along the lines proposed, and that an initial approach to these governments should be made through our Missions in Lisbon and Madrid. (The location of any subsequent negotiations would be determined in consultation with the Spanish and Portuguese authorities to suit the convenience of the participants.)

(b) In addition, it is recommended that representatives of the Departments of Fisheries, Trade and Commerce, Finance, and the Department of External Affairs should be responsible for the conduct of such negotiations under the chairmanship of the representative from the Department of External Affairs.

It is understood that Cabinet will be kept informed of the progress of these negotiations and that if it should appear necessary at a later stage to depart from the principles outlined in this Memorandum, the matter will be referred to Cabinet for further instructions.¹²

TRADE AGREEMENT WITH SPAIN

At its meeting on February 3rd Cabinet approved a recommendation submitted by the Secretary of State for External Affairs with the concurrence of the Ministers of Trade and Commerce, Finance and Fisheries that negotiations for trade agreements with Portugal and Spain should be initiated and that the Cabinet would be kept informed of the progress of such negotiations.

Last week a Canadian delegation headed by the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. W.F. Bull concluded negotiations with Spanish officials and the text of an Agreement between Spain and Canada was initialled by the heads of the Canadian and Spanish delegations. The text of this Agreement has been examined by the officials of the Departments concerned and it is found to be substantially in accord with the recommendations for an Agreement outlined in the earlier submission to Cabinet. In addition the Exchange of Notes appended to the Agreement contains an undertaking by Spain to allocate sufficient foreign exchange for the purchase by Spanish importers of 2,000 tons of Canadian codfish annually. This Exchange of Notes has been examined and is considered to be satisfactory. In return for this concession and the extension of most-favoured-nation treatment to Canadian exports to Spain, Canada is obligated under the Agreement to extend most-favoured-nation treatment to Spain and all its overseas territories and will grant small tariff concessions on olives, almonds, paprika and olive oil. In the circumstances it would seem desirable that the text of the Agreement and the accompanying Exchange of Notes should be approved by Canada and that the Minister of Public Works, the Honourable R.H. Winters, should sign this Agreement with Spain during his visit to that country from May 23rd to May 27th. Alternatively, if it should not prove feasible for Mr. Winters to sign, it would seem appropriate for the Canadian Ambassador to Spain, Lieut-General Maurice Pope, to conclude the Agreement on behalf of Canada.

In the light of the above considerations it is recommended:

(a) that the Agreement and accompanying Exchange of Notes between Canada and Spain be approved;

(b) that authority by Order-in-Council be obtained to sign the Agreement.¹³

Provision is also made for a future increase in this quota of 3,000 tons provided the conditions outlined in the Notes are complied with. Portugal and its overseas territories, Canada is obligated under the Agreement to extend most-favoured-nation treatment to Portugal and all its overseas territories and will grant small tariff concessions on almonds and corks. In addition there will be a letter to the Portuguese Director-General of Economic Affairs on the subject of port privileges extended to Portuguese fishing vessels on the Atlantic coast. This letter has been included at the request of the Portuguese Government which is concerned that Canada might see fit to curtail port privileges extended to Portuguese fishing vessels in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. In this letter the Canadian Government does not make any commitments to the Government of Portugal. It is in fact a simple statement that the Canadian Government is not at the present time giving consideration to any change in policy and practice concerning the special privileges and facilities that have for many years been granted to Portuguese fishing vessels in Canadian Atlantic ports.

The Minister of Public Works, the Honourable R.H. Winters, will be in Lisbon from May 27th to May 31st and it would seem appropriate for him to sign the agreement and the accompanying Exchange of Notes during his visit to Portugal. Alternatively, should it not prove feasible for Mr. Winters to sign, it would seem desirable for the Canadian Minister to Portugal, the Honourable W.F.A. In the light of the above considerations it is recommended:

STRATEGIC CONTROLS OVER EAST-WEST TRADE

I attach for your consideration a memorandum on this subject which was drafted after extensive discussions between officials of this Department and the Department of Trade and Commerce. In view of the importance of the forthcoming Consultative Group meeting in Paris on April 13 and 14, it was thought desirable to lay the matter before Cabinet. As a first step the attached memorandum was sent to the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce under cover of a letter dated March 24, with the request that we be informed as soon as Mr. C.D. Howe had approved it (with whatever modifications he wished to make) so that we could then seek your concurrence.

We have just learned, however, that Mr. Howe has approved the memorandum but does not think it should go before Cabinet. He has indicated that if you also agree with it we might send it off to Paris by tomorrow's bag (Friday noon) for the guidance of Mr. Wilgress, who has agreed to head the Canadian delegation now that Mr. Harold Stassen is definitely going to head the United States delegation. Mr. Denis Harvey of the Department of Trade and Commerce will probably fly over to Paris for the meeting.

I would be grateful to learn at your early convenience whether:

- (i) the memorandum meets with your approval, and
- (ii) you agree with Mr. Howe that there is no need for it to be considered by Cabinet.¹⁵

STRATEGIC CONTROLS OVER EAST-WEST TRADE

During the past six months or more an international debate has been going on, particularly in Europe, over the question of whether trade between the West and the Soviet Bloc should be increased. The cessation of open hostilities in Korea, the levelling off of economic activity in Europe coupled with the decline in United States aid and the recent Soviet drive for increased trade, have all given added impetus to the pressures that are building up for the relaxation of present strategic controls over East-West trade. Prime Minister Churchill's statement on this subject in the House of Commons on February 25 has stimulated the controversy and focused the attention of Western governments on the need to re-appraise at an early stage their attitudes towards trade with the Soviet Bloc.¹⁶

2. Canada's interest would seem to lie in ensuring that full account is taken of the security aspects of this problem, the importance of maintaining the unity of the Western governments in the face of disruptive Soviet tactics, and the need for keeping the impact of controls on Canada's economy to the minimum consistent with the first two objectives mentioned above.

3. The appropriate forum for a discussion of this subject by representatives of the Western governments is the secret Consultative Group (C.G.), which was established informally in Paris in 1949. Canada, the other NATO member countries, West Germany and Japan all belong to this Paris Group. Its Co-ordinating and China Committees (COCOM and CHICOM) have the task of co-ordinating the policies of the Participating Countries in the field of controls over movements of strategic commodities to Soviet Bloc destinations. To this end they keep under continual review three types of lists which can only be modified with the unanimous consent of all Participating Countries.

These are:

List I—commodities under absolute embargo.

List II—commodities whose strategic significance depends upon the volume exported to the Soviet Bloc or upon their qualities and possible defence uses. Items on this list are described in detail and export quotas are allotted to Participating Countries for some of them. A complex procedure has been worked out to provide for exceptions to this type of quantitative and qualitative control, and it is explained in the attached copy of COCOM Document 470. (Annex A).

List III—commodities of low strategic importance not under control but which are carefully watched in case the volume of shipments should reach levels which warrant their being placed on List II.

¹⁶ Voir/See United Kingdom, House of Commons, Debates, 1954, Vol. 524, pp. 587-588.

4. It was largely for the purpose of implementing Canada's COCOM and CHICOM commitments that the new Export and Import Permits Act was cast in the form of Bill 374 (especially Sections 3(a) and (b)). Ministers will, of course, be familiar with Mr. Dickey's reference to these responsibilities in the course of his statement to the House on March 16.¹⁷

5. In the past Canada has not played a particularly active role in the Paris Group. As most of the C.G. meetings have been of a largely routine nature, Canada has usually been represented by members of the missions in Paris, whose participation has generally been rather passive. This year, however, an exceptionally important C.G. meeting is to be held in Paris on April 13 and 14 (possibly continuing after a fortnight's recess). It is expected to mark a turning point in the West's trade relations with the European Soviet Bloc. (No changes are foreseen in connection with controls over trade with Red China until after a Korean settlement, but the forthcoming Geneva meetings may open up that question this summer).

6. Perhaps the most important items on the agenda for the meeting are:

(a) Development of the trade policy of the Soviet Bloc in its bearing on the work of the Committee.

(b) Review of the present system of international controls (lists and methods).

(c) Adoption of a common attitude on control policy during future international economic conferences.

These will provide the framework for a debate on the future of the West's strategic control policies. The United States Government is known to mistrust the Soviet Bloc's motives in seeking increased trade with the West, and to look upon recent trends as reflecting little more than a shift in Soviet tactics in the trade sector rather than as a genuine desire on their part for more trade. While the United States will probably be willing to compromise somewhat with the European countries at the C.G. meeting, they nevertheless hope embargo controls will remain fairly extensive and even more effective. Their position is outlined in the attached statement of March 9 by the United States COCOM delegate (Annex B). Also attached (Annex C) is a statement made on March 8 by the United Kingdom delegate, which indicates that the United Kingdom will press for the reduction of the area of control (by redefining what items are really strategic) and probably also for the elimination of Lists II and III, with tighter controls over the remaining List I. Both the United States and the United Kingdom agree, as a result of the Berlin Conference, that the West should now think in terms of a prolonged period of tension just short of war. The majority of European countries will quite likely support the United Kingdom, and Canada's position will consequently assume increased importance. If Canada supports the United States, some compromise will have to be worked out which would not entirely satisfy the Europeans and might well lead to an undermining of the control system later on. If, however, Canada supports the Europeans, the United States will be isolated and will probably have to give way to a greater extent than they would like. Naturally both sides are anxious to have Canadian support, and they look to Canada to come to the meeting with an unprejudiced and objective attitude, untrammelled by political complications such as afflict relations between the United States and the European countries.

7. This matter has been discussed inter-departmentally and, on balance, it is considered that it would appear to be in Canada's best interests to support the liberalization of trading relations between the West and the Soviet Bloc (excepting North Korea and Mainland China). There is a need to reduce the impact of controls on Canada's economy and on relations with other friendly countries. If we were very selective in the commodities we control, but able to enforce our controls rigorously, we could hope to continue enjoying wide-spread political support in Canada for a control system aimed primarily at items involving clearly overriding security interests. Otherwise, it might be politically embarrassing to ask Canadian commercial interests to make sacrifices for no apparently good reason if Western European countries do not uphold similar embargo policies.

8. In the circumstances, I recommend, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that:

(i) Authority be granted to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and to myself to appoint an appropriate Canadian delegation to the forthcoming C.G. meeting in Paris. (It is believed that Mr. Harold Stassen, the Head of the Foreign Operations Administration, may be the chief United States delegate).

(ii) The delegation be authorized to agree at its discretion to modifications that may be proposed in present COCOM international embargo Lists I and II provided they are supported by a clear majority of the Participating Countries, subject to the following basic considerations:

(a) It would appear to be to the advantage of the West for controls on trade to be the minimum consistent with the need to safeguard important security interests.

(b) Whatever controls are maintained should be enforced with the greatest possible effectiveness.

(c) The need for Participating Countries to apply for exceptions to embargo lists should be eliminated as far as possible by transferring the more important items to List I and freeing all others to the extent that this can now be done with reasonable safety.

(d) No exceptions at all to List I should be envisaged, but present exception procedures (Annex A) governing List II should be broadened to take into account political, commercial, social (i.e., unemployment) and other considerations apart from purely strategic ones, provided that the C.G. should not get involved in subjects beyond its competence, such as broad commercial policy.

(iii) The question of relaxations of controls over trade with the Far Eastern Soviet Bloc should not be considered until after the United Nations embargo resolution of May 18, 1951, is rescinded.

EXPORT CONTROLS — COCOM — MEMORANDUM FROM THE CHAIRMAN OF COCOM ON REVIEW OF THE INTERNATIONAL LISTS (ANNEX A TO COCOM DOCUMENT
NO. 1555)† — ITEM V OF PROPOSED C.G. AGENDA

Following for D. Harvey from H.B. Scully, Begins: Following is the text quoted in full:

"I have been requested by the Chairman of the Consultative Group, Monsieur Charpentier, to circulate to all member governments through their delegations to the Coordinating Committee, the attached text of a proposed instruction from the Consultative Group to the committee concerning a review of the international lists. The attached proposal has been submitted by the government of the United States for the consideration of other member governments at the forthcoming Consultative Group meeting on the 13th April, 1954, in connection with agenda Item V.

Draft instruction from CG to COCOM on review of international lists. Conclusions with respect to the Soviet bloc in Europe.

1. During the past year there have been significant changes in the relations of the West to the Soviet bloc which justify a basic review of the international control system developed in past years. It now appears that though the basic nature of the Soviet threat remains unchanged and the possibility of local Communist-incited hostilities constantly exists, the period of maximum danger of a general war appears less immediate than has heretofore been the case, and that the control system therefore,

- (a) Must be set up on a basis which permits its operation for the long haul;
- (b) Must be fashioned in a manner which gives appropriate recognition to the economic, financial and political situations of the participating countries; and
- (c) Must be more selective, substantially less extensive in coverage, simpler in form, and
- (d) Must be reinforced as necessary to make its operation fully effective.

2. The international-listing guides that are attached have been framed by the Consultative Group with the expectation that, when applied, they will achieve these objectives. These guides provide a basis for determining whether an item merits international listing.

3. The Consultative Group has agreed that COCOM should undertake promptly a comprehensive review of the international lists on the basis of these guides, and should report to the Consultative Group the results of the review for such further CG consideration as the participating governments may then deem appropriate.

4. The Consultative Group directs COCOM: (a) to carry out this review of the international lists by _____ (date), taking up categories of items successively in accordance with the attached schedule, and (b) to recommend implementation by governments at appropriate stages of the review.

Conclusions with respect to Communist China and North Korea

5. The attached guides do not affect exports to Communist China and North Korea. With respect to these areas, the Consultative Group has agreed that the existing level of export restrictions should be continued.

Schedule of categories for review:

- (1) Metal-working machinery and rolling mills.
- (2) Electric power generating equipment.
- (3) Metals, minerals and their manufactures.
- (4) Rubber and rubber products.
- (5) Transportation equipment.
- (6) General industrial equipment (minus rolling mills).
- (7) Electronic and precision instruments; and miscellaneous.
- (8) Chemical and petroleum products.
- (9) Chemical and petroleum equipment.

Proposed international listing guides

(Note: These guides do not pertain to items on the atomic-energy and munition lists.)

Classes of eligible items

An item shall be considered eligible for international listing only if it falls within one of the following classes:

(a) Materials and equipment (by types and grades) which are designed specially or used principally for the development, production or utilization of arms, ammunition, implements of war, (and atomic energy materials).

(b) Materials and equipment (by types and grades) which incorporate advanced technology or unique technological know-how (including production know-how), the acquisition of which may reasonably be expected to permit a significant advance in Soviet bloc technology in military or atomic energy production over the level of development already achieved or expected to be achieved within a short period.

(c) Materials and equipment (by types and grades) in which the Soviet Bloc has a deficiency which is critical in relation to its military capabilities and which it could not overcome within a short period. Ends.

CONSULTATIVE GROUP MEETING APRIL 13

We are sending you by today's bag a copy of a memorandum which was prepared in the expectation that Cabinet would be asked to consider what position Canada should take at the meeting. This memorandum has now been approved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and by myself, and we have agreed that it need not be considered by Cabinet.

2. In view of the character and importance of the forthcoming meeting, it is our hope (which Trade and Commerce share) that you may feel free to attend as head of the Canadian delegation. However, this is a matter for your judgment after you learn what the United States and United Kingdom level of representation will be. We, therefore, leave to your discretion the question of whether your attendance would be appropriate and desirable. Mr. Denis Harvey of the Department of Trade and Commerce will be on the delegation, and if you decide to attend he will be able to brief you more effectively on the spot than we could hope to do in writing.

3. We do not propose to send a special set of detailed instructions for the guidance of the delegation. Instead, we would wish it to be guided by the general lines laid down in the memorandum (which was prepared in such a way as to serve this purpose). We do not envisage the Head of the delegation taking an active part at the meeting or doing anything more than make a fairly brief statement of Canada's position which is, in a nut-shell, that we hope to see the COCOM control system adjusted to the "long haul" concept by reducing the strategic lists and improving the controls over whatever is left on them. A statement on this theme could be suitably amplified on the basis of paragraphs 2, 7 and 8 of the memorandum, as appropriate.

4. It seems probable that the C.G. will confine itself to statements by delegations and a debate on the terms of the instructions that should be given to COCOM for the review of the international lists. We do not anticipate any great difficulty over this. We have already seen (Embassy telegram No. 136 of April 2)† the text of a United States draft circulated by the Chairman of COCOM on the review of the international lists. It seems obvious that the bulk of the detailed work will be done in the Coordinating Committee over the next three months or so.

5. For your information, we held discussions here in Ottawa on April 1 and 2 with Karl Anderson (Deputy Director Bureau of Foreign Commerce) and other United States officials on the whole question of East-West trade controls. We indicated to them that we could support the draft instructions quoted in the Embassy's telegram but we emphasized that, in the case of class (c) items eligible for control, a great deal seemed to depend upon the meaning of the word "critical". We felt that for practical purposes the Participating Countries could only be expected to express their views, not in general terms, but in relation to each item as it is debated. Apart from the review itself, there may be difficulties over the question of transaction controls. We have the impression that the United Kingdom are hesitant about imposing them, but without such controls the system is not as effective as it should be.

6. Please refer a copy of this telegram to the Embassy for Scully. Ends.

EAST-WEST TRADE CONTROLS

We are grateful for your reports on talks with Coulson who, we gather, may now head the United Kingdom delegation to the consultative Group meeting in Paris on April 13 instead of Thornycroft. It seems unlikely Stassen will be able to attend for United States. As you will have seen from our telegram No. 222 to CANAC today, we are leaving it to discretion of Mr. Wilgress whether he should represent Canada or not.

2. We have repeated to you Paris telegram No. 136 of April 2 containing text of United States draft instructions from Consultative Group to COCOM for review of the international lists. By next bag we hope to send you copy of the memorandum mentioned in our telegram No. 222 and the covering letter indicating our willingness to accept the United States draft with two minor changes.

3. For purposes of any further conversations you may have with Coulson or other United Kingdom officials, you may find the following information helpful. On April 1 and 2 we held discussions here in Ottawa with a group of United States officials headed by Karl Anderson, Deputy Director, Bureau of Foreign Commerce. We made clear to them our concern that divergencies between the United Kingdom and United States positions at the C.G. meeting should be kept to a minimum. You will appreciate that our position would be uncomfortable if serious differences of policies are not resolved. Canada's attitude is that the international lists should be modified to adapt them to the long haul (this is covered by our acceptance of the United States draft instructions to COCOM) but that whatever controls remain should be as effective as possible.

4. You might mention that we are not too happy about the impression we have gained that the United Kingdom are making the imposition of transaction control conditional upon agreement that the international lists should be substantially reduced. We regard these two issues as entirely separate and distinct, and regret the appearance that the United Kingdom is seeking to bargain one for the other. This, moreover, is an example of the sort of difference between United Kingdom and United States attitudes which might embarrass us somewhat in COCOM.

EXPORT CONTROLS — COCOM — C.G. MEETING

Following for D. Harvey from H.B. Scully, Begins: The United Kingdom delegation today circulated a memorandum concerning Item 4 of the C.G. agenda, the essence of which in the light of current expansion as compared with recent low levels of trade between the Soviet Bloc and the free world are as follows:

1. That from time to time the consultative group should arrange a discussion on Soviet trading tactics and their effect on strategic controls, in the light of the experience of the various participating countries.

2. That members should provide more regular information on Soviet attempts to obtain strategic goods, directly or indirectly, and on other aspects of Soviet Trade which may affect trade in such goods.

3. That members should feel free to present information concerning trade between non-participating countries and the Soviet Bloc, particularly information concerning trade in strategic goods, and to request a discussion.

The United States also circulated a memorandum for C.G.: Consideration on diversions and leakages, as a basis for discussion in connection with C.G. agenda Point 5.

Briefly, it expresses concern over the extent to which security control can be evaded by transshipment and other forms of diversion en route and recommends the following principles and courses of action for confirmation at the forthcoming C.G. meeting to be applied until such time as a general reinforced system of controls can be established.

(1) The responsibility for preventing diversions of shipments is a co-operative one shared by all participating countries. Irrespective of the residence of the owner of the goods, participating countries should see that, as far as possible, these controls are not frustrated by diversions within their jurisdiction.

(2) There should be a full use of and exchange of information and cooperation among enforcement services as well as full resort to other means for the detection, stopping, and subsequent investigation of the illegal shipments.

(3) Whenever an attempt at unauthorized diversion is identified:

(a) Any participating country obtaining the information should notify immediately the country of origin and other participating and non-participating countries likely to be concerned with the shipment or in a position to gain control.

(b) The participating country through which the goods are passing (or are expected to pass) should use its available powers to prevent an unauthorized diversion. Further movement of the goods should be allowed only in accordance with the agreed policy of the group. If such country does not yet possess the powers to obtain effective control it should use its best endeavours to delay the shipment, notifying immediately the country of origin and the other participating and non-participating countries likely to be concerned with the shipment or in a position to gain control.

(4) Information or requests for action should be handled in the most expeditious manner possible. In some cases this may be through normal diplomatic channels; in other cases it may be through COCOM or both. In either case the country becoming aware of a diversion should notify its delegate in Paris who should pass the information to the delegates of the other countries concerned and notify the committee. In cases where the shipment originates in a participating country, it is the responsibility of the delegate of that country to coordinate action. In cases where the shipment originates in a non-participating country, the delegate bringing the case to the notice of the committee should normally assume responsibility for coordinating action. In both type of cases, it will be the duty of the Secretariat to provide such assistance as may be required.

(5) Exchanges between participating countries of technical experts responsible for enforcement activities should be encouraged.

Delegates have been requested to inform the Secretariat by Friday, April 9, names of their C.B. delegates so that necessary arrangements can be made. Ends.

EXPORT CONTROLS — COCOM — CONSULTATIVE GROUP MEETING

With reference to the consultative group meeting held on April 13 and 14, there has not yet been a distribution of general statements made by delegations nor has the draft copy of the C.G. chairman's report been submitted to COCOM for comment. We are sending a stenographer's transcript of our statement in today's air bag.

In view of Mr. Harvey's attendance at the meeting, we do not propose to make a full interim report in advance of the official minutes of the meeting.

The following points however should be considered in relation to the general aspects and agreement of the proposals contained in the draft statements previously referred to you (ref. our telegram No. 136 (CC-67),[†] COCOM document No. 1563 of April 5 and our letter No. 591 of April 8[†] and documents Nos. 1565 and 1566).¹⁸

(1). Items 4 and 5 of the agenda were reversed with the result that review of the present system of international controls occurred before the general consideration of development of trade policy of the Soviets, etc.

(2). It was decided to replace 3 and 4 of enclosure 1 to document 1563 with the following single paragraph:

"3. The consultative group directs COCOM: (a) To undertake promptly a comprehensive review of the international lists on the basis of the attached guides and interpretative notes. (b) To carry out this review by July 1st 1954, taking up categories of items successively in accordance with the schedule as approved and; (c) Promptly upon completion of the review, to report the results of such review to the consultative group for appraisal and action: provided, however, that COCOM may, upon agreement, before the final report of the review, recommend to member governments earlier action upon revisions in the listing of particular items which have been reviewed".

(3). At the Japanese request, an amended conclusion with respect to Communist China and North Korea was made to paragraph 5 of COCOM 1563 as follows: "The attached guides do not affect exports to Communist China and North Korea. With respect to these areas, the consultative group has agreed that the existing level of export restrictions should be continued for the time being and these problems be examined at the next consultative group meeting in July. In this connection, the consultative group has recognized that these security control measures could not be fully effective unless applied to the Communist world as a whole."

(4). The C.G. issued the following directives to COCOM with respect to document No. 1566 and adopted the proposals contained in COCOM document No. 1565; "The consultative group directs the coordinating committee to seek means and procedures acceptable to all participating governments for the reinforcement of the controls, in the light of the above principles and taking into account the discussion which has taken place on this subject."

(5). Concerning Item 6, the C.G. recommends to member governments that before participating in an international conference in the course of which the control of east-west trade might arise, they consult together with the object of maintaining the unity of policy necessary to the application of their controls.

COCOM considered on April 15th the schedule contained in enclosure 2 of COCOM 1563 which had been adopted by the consultative group with one modification, (transposal of Item 7 for review after Item 2). It was decided that discussions aimed at the revision of lists would commence April 27th on the following time table:

1. April 27—metal working machinery and rolling mills.
2. May 3—electric power generating equipment.
3. May 10—Electronic and precision instruments and miscellaneous.
4. May 17—metals, minerals and their manufacture.
5. Rubber and rubber products to be reviewed concurrently with No. 4.
6. May 24—transportation equipment.
7. May 31—general industrial equipment, minus rolling mills.
8. June 8—chemical and petroleum products.
9. June 14—chemical and petroleum equipment.

As to the timing of implementation of decisions the consultative group with the notable exception of the United Kingdom favoured an "en masse" method of deferring implementation on all items until after completion and examination of the total results of the review. As a result of the United Kingdom's position favouring the "peel-off" method of immediately implementing decisions on individual items as made, they came out strongly in favour of COCOM's activities being concentrated on revision of lists in accordance with the above schedule, leaving decisions directed at the reinforcement of existing controls and constructive steps in the direction of establishing and adopting transshipment and transaction control, to be fitted in as opportunity occurs prior to July 1st. We reiterated that the tightening and improved efficiency of controls demanded careful consideration and was a complementary factor in the revision of the lists.

It was decided that export control matters would be fitted into the schedule of discussions during the week commencing May 7th.

In relation to the schedule of review, we should have your instructions and comments relating to each group together with any detailed material on individual items in which we are interested several days in advance of the opening date for discussions.

SALE OF SHIPS TO SOVIET BLOC

I attach for your consideration and approval a draft memorandum on this subject for the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy. It has just been approved by the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce and, subject to your concurrence, it could be reproduced this week for consideration at the Committee's next meeting early next week.

2. The attached memorandum was prepared after fairly lengthy consultations between officials of this Department, the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Joint Intelligence Bureau, and the Canadian Maritime Commission. It does not, however, represent the agreed views of all the foregoing, especially as the interests of the Maritime Commission and the Joint Intelligence Bureau are somewhat at variance. In the circumstances it was considered most appropriate to have the submission approved by you and Mr. Bull alone.

3. Concerning the reason for submitting this memorandum, you may recall that Mr. Chevrier sent a letter to Mr. Pearson on which the Minister wrote a footnote to the effect that Cabinet had decided that this matter should be referred to the I.C.E.T.P. There is no record of that in the Cabinet minutes, however.

POLICY ON SALE OF SHIPS TO SOVIET BLOC

On March 4 Cabinet considered a memorandum from the Chairman of the Canadian Maritime Commission (attached as Annex A) and directed that the I.C.E.T.P., should examine this subject in the light of the following telegram which was sent from Moscow on February 20 to certain Member Yards of the Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing Association:

“Would appreciate if you send us your best offer for cargo ships 10000 tons deadweight 16-17 knots refrigerated fish carriers 3500 deadweight 14-15 knots sea tugs 1000-1500 horsepower fishing trawlers up to 1000 horsepower with refrigerated cargo spaces about 500 cubic meters thanks beforehand

Transmasimport 1300”.

2. It should be mentioned that on February 26 representatives of the Association were informed by the Department of Trade and Commerce that export permits covering sales of such ships to the Soviet Bloc would not be granted because vessels of those types were regarded as being strategic.

3. In considering this subject the Committee may find it helpful to have the following background information. Since 1949 Canada has been co-operating with her NATO allies, West Germany, and Japan, through the medium of the Consultative Group Co-ordinating Committee (CG/COCOM) to restrict and control exports of strategic commodities to the Soviet Bloc. Ships are included in this category and at present all COCOM Participating Countries (P.C.'s) are bound by undertakings to control sales of ships in accordance with certain mutually agreed limitations. These are set out in Annex G.†

4. Vessels on International List I are totally embargoed. Those on List II are subject to less rigid controls which allow for certain exceptions. It should be noted that, to the extent that trade does take place involving List II vessels, the exporting P.C.'s are required under present exception procedures to justify each proposed sale in advance and to obtain the unanimous consent of COCOM. The guiding principle for such exceptions is that exports should be permitted only to the extent required in order to obtain imports from the Soviet Bloc which are essential to sustain the basic economy of the exporting country, and thereby to support its defence effort. Accordingly, exports are not permitted by COCOM, and could not be justified by a P.C., for the purpose of maintaining or developing export markets in the Soviet Bloc or for similar reasons. In other words, a P.C. wishing to sell a List II ship must prove to COCOM that the balance of strategic advantage lies with the West under the quid pro quo deal with its Soviet Bloc trading partner.

5. The effect of COCOM's restrictive policy since 1950 has been to curtail Soviet Bloc acquisitions of vessels from the traditional Western European sources of supply, so much so that the levels of the Soviet Bloc fleets are well below what they would like them to be. Of course it is open to the U.S.S.R. to divert some of her shipbuilding resources from naval construction (submarines, commerce raiders, etc.) to peaceful purposes, but there is no indication that they are prepared to do that.

6. In the circumstances, it will be appreciated that the probable explanation for the Moscow telegram to the Canadian Shipyards of last February 20 is two-fold:

(a) The U.S.S.R. is being driven to seek ships from countries outside of Europe only because of the COCOM embargo policies which have limited their purchases from the more logical and cheaper sources. (Were this not so, it seems highly unlikely that the high-cost Canadian shipyards would have received any Soviet inquiries at all).

(b) The offer to purchase Canadian ships was a shrewd manoeuvre or propaganda tactic intended to cause friction and embarrassment in our relations with our COCOM partners. It is evident that for Canada to permit such sales would be to take an unfair advantage of the European countries which have been denying themselves such orders for several years, and would undoubtedly lead to severe criticism of our reversal of policy. Moreover, Canada could not hope to justify sales under the principles described in para. 4 above.

7. Recently many other P.C.'s in Western Europe have received offers from Soviet sources to purchase ships. Because of growing idleness in their shipyards and for other political and social reasons, they are beginning to think in terms of relaxing the shipping controls described in Annex G. In the face of mounting pressure from many of these P.C.'s for a complete revision of the present control criteria, the United States and United Kingdom Governments have held bilateral discussions in the past few months with a view to revising the controls in such a way as to accommodate the legitimate needs for changes and improvements in the system, and yet at the same time retain effective control over Soviet acquisitions of strategically important ships. On November 30 joint United States-United Kingdom proposals on the control of fishing vessels were circulated as COCOM Document 1439 (attached as Annex B).† Later, on February 26, they circulated joint proposals on merchant ships as Document 1516 (Annex C).† These documents illustrate many of the problems facing the West in determining the extent to which it would be reasonable and safe for them to permit sales of ships to the Soviet Bloc. The attitude adopted by the Canadian representative at COCOM towards these joint proposals is reflected in the statements in Annexes D† and E,† which are attached for the information of those members of the Committee who may be interested.

8. Canada has consistently favoured rather strict limitations on sales of ships to the Soviet Bloc, and has not permitted any Canadian vessels to be sold to them since 1949, on the grounds that almost all ships have some degree of potential use as naval auxiliary vessels and, therefore, merit embargo treatment according to their potential danger to the West. This attitude is consistent with our view that Canada's interest in the strategic control field lies in protecting the security of the West, in maintaining harmony among the COCOM P.C.'s, and in keeping controls over legitimate trade to a minimum consistent with the first two objectives. The foregoing comment is amplified in a draft memorandum prepared in connection with the Consultative Group meeting held in Paris on April 13 and 14 (Annex H).¹⁹ It was approved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

9. The following conclusions suggest themselves:

(i) In view of Canada's obligation to respect the embargo restrictions on sales of ships to the Soviet Bloc as agreed by COCOM, the Department of Trade and Commerce may not in the present circumstances grant export permits for ships coming within the categories listed in Annex G.

(ii) In the light of (i) above, no encouragement should be given by the Canadian Government to the Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing Association to obtain orders for such ships from the Soviet Bloc.

(iii) If, however, any Soviet orders are actually placed with Canadian shipyards for vessels falling outside the area of control, applications for export permits should be submitted by the Department of Trade and Commerce to Cabinet for consideration.

(iv) For the purpose of future discussions in COCOM about the joint United States-United Kingdom proposals (Annexes B and C), the Canadian delegate should be instructed not to press for any changes in the present COCOM policies governing exports of ships to the Soviet Bloc, but if it seems likely that new quota control systems will be established, he should

(a) take no special steps to secure a Canadian quota, and

(b) press for the global quota to be so apportioned to P.C.'s as to leave an unallocated reserve which could be used (by Canada or other P.C.'s) only with the prior unanimous approval of COCOM.

types of ships for the account of the U.S.S.R. A copy of the cable, dated 20th February, 1954, via All Union Corporation in Moscow, received by the shipyards, is quoted below:

"Would appreciate if you send us your best offer for cargo ships 10000 tons deadweight 16-17 knots refrigerated fish carriers 3500 deadweight 14-15 knots sea tugs 1000-1500 horsepower fishing trawlers up to 1000 horsepower with refrigerated cargo spaces about 500 cubic meters thanks beforehand

The Association is seeking the assistance of the Canadian Maritime Commission in finding out if the government approves of the shipyards following up the inquiry of the U.S.S.R.

Yesterday, 1st March, Mr. Ivanov, Attaché at the Embassy of the U.S.S.R., telephoned the Executive Secretary of the Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing Association suggesting that he call to obtain information with respect to the shipbuilding industry in Canada for the use of the trade officer recently arrived from Moscow.

In view of the fact that the Association had written to the Commission seeking guidance on the subject and, furthermore, since the Directors of the Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing Association are meeting at Ottawa on 9th and 10th March, it was suggested to Mr. Ivanov that his visit be postponed until the attitude of the government is known.

The shipbuilding industry, foreseeing the necessity of securing additional work for the shipyards, would take immediate action in going after the potential business indicated in the cable from Moscow if the attitude of the government were favourable to such a course of action.

This raises the whole question of strategic controls; I realize that this subject belongs largely to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Secretary of State for External Affairs; the Commission proposes raising the issue with the Deputy Ministers involved and recommending further negotiations for these soviet orders unless there are cogent reasons against such a course. If there is objection from COCOM (the co-ordinating committee of the Consultative Group) I think that it should be fought if other COCOM countries are accepting similar orders.

If you agree the Commission will take the matter up with the Deputy Ministers involved and you may wish to discuss the matter with Mr. Howe and Mr. Pearson.

STATEMENT BY CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVE AT CONSULTATIVE GROUP MEETING ON EAST-WEST TRADE CONTROLS

The attached document contains a statement made by Mr. Wilgress on April 13 to the Consultative Group which met briefly to prepare a directive to its Co-ordinating Committee (COCOM) for its guidance in reviewing and revising the three international lists of strategic commodities.

2. The importance of this meeting lay in the fact that it marked the turning point in the policies of the Western Allies which they had followed since the beginning of the cold war in about 1950. Following the Berlin Conference, and in particular Mr. Churchill's statement on February 25, the majority of Western Governments came to feel that the strategic controls over East-West trade should be relaxed substantially and adapted to the new concept that war is less imminent than it had been during the previous years, and that the West is in for a long period of tension short of war. The United Kingdom had taken the lead in pressing for reductions of the control lists, and the United States found itself at the other extreme, trying to put the brake on the European movement in a direction of freer trade in semi-strategic or marginal commodities.

3. The attached statement sets out the Canadian position which is to a large extent a compromise between those of the United States and the United Kingdom. For clarification it should be mentioned that international List I involves total embargo, List II a quantitative or quota type embargo, and List III a watch list. Items on List III can be freely traded, but if the volume of shipments becomes significant they might be placed on List II. (Stenographer's notes of statement by Mr. Wilgress April 13th)²⁰

à la réunion du Groupe consultatifStatement by Permanent Representative to North Atlantic Council to Consultative Group Meeting*

[Paris], April 15, 1954

I should like to outline the principles which the Canadian Government thinks should govern the present system of international controls. After that I would like to comment on Document No. 1563 submitted by the United States Delegate and also the comment of the United States Delegate in introducing this paper this morning.

We agree with what previous speakers have said about the necessity of reducing the lists and making the remaining controls more effective. The main interest of the Canadian Government lies in ensuring that full account is taken of the security aspects of the problem. Secondly, we recognise the importance of maintaining the unity of the Governments of the Free World in the face of opposing Soviet tactics. Thirdly, we have to consider the need for keeping the impact of controls on Canadian economy to the minimum consistent always with the realisation of the first two objectives.

Taking into account these three factors, we have come to the conclusion that we should support the liberalisation of trading relations between the West and the Soviet Bloc except Communist China and the North Koreans. If there is any need to reduce the impact of controls on our economy and on our relations with other free countries — if we were to be very selective in the commodities we control, but enabled to enforce these controls vigorously, we could hope to continue widespread political support in Canada for a control system dealing primarily with items of clearly overriding security interest. Otherwise it might be politically embarrassing to ask Canadian commercial interests to make sacrifices for no apparently good reason, if other Western countries did not uphold similar embargo policies.

We can agree to modifications that may be proposed in the present COCOM embargo lists I and II provided they are supported by a clear majority of the participating countries, and subject to the following basic considerations:

1. It would appear to be to the advantage of the West for controls on trade to be the minimum consistent with the need to safeguard important security interests.
2. Whatever controls are maintained should be enforced with the greatest possible effectiveness.
3. The need for participating countries to apply for exceptions to embargo lists should be eliminated as far as possible by transferring the more important items to List I and freeing others to the extent that this can now be done with reasonable safety.
4. No exceptions at all to List I should be envisaged. The present exceptions procedures governing List II should be broadened to take into account political, commercial, social — that is unemployment — and other considerations apart from purely strategical ones, provided that the Consultative Group and the Coordinating Committee should not get involved in subjects beyond its competence, such as broad commercial policy.

Finally, the question of relaxations of controls over trade with Communist China and North Korea should not be considered until after the United Nations embargo resolution of the 18th May 1951 is rescinded. We accept Document 1563 as a suitable basis for instructions to COCOM for the further consideration of this problem.

We are in agreement with the date that has been suggested of the 1st July for a target date, but we feel that this should be a target date rather than a deadline. The United States representative in his opening remarks referred to the importance of proceeding as rapidly as possible with the review of the lists, but pointed out that the Coordinating Committee should not be given a task which is beyond their capacity, and that they should not be hurried to too great an extent. We would therefore favour a change in the wording which is given in paragraph 4 of Enclosure No. 1 to Document 1563 in order to indicate that this date of the 1st July is more a target date than a fixed deadline. We would not like to see COCOM confronted in the last days of June with a mad rush in order to complete this task in time. We would propose, instead of saying in paragraph 4(a) "to carry out this review of the International Lists by the 1st July", that it should read somewhat as follows:

"To carry out this review of the International Lists as a matter of urgency and, if possible, by the 1st July".

We think that that would give COCOM sufficient leeway so that they would make every effort to discharge their task by the date they have set; but they would not be faced with the impossible position of having to hurry matters at the last moment.

As regards the remarks of the United States representative in introducing the lists this morning, we are also of the view expressed by our Italian and French colleagues that the correct approach would be the "en masse" method of implementation rather than the "peeling off" method. We think it would only result in confusion if we were to adopt the peeling off method, and we would favour that the implementation of the modifications should take place all at one time, simultaneously at the end of the review by the Coordinating Committee.

As regards the number of Lists, we think the ideal, of course, would be if we could have only two lists — say one embargo list and a watch list, but we do not think that this is practicable. We think that in going over the Lists of items, COCOM will find that it will be necessary to retain some items for quantitative control; and we feel that COCOM should have a free hand in this matter, and that they should maintain three Lists if they find that is necessary, always having in mind the desirability of reducing to a minimum the products which are subject to quantity control.

Our approach to this problem, as I have said in my general statement, is that in reducing the number of items subject to control, we feel that the remaining controls should be made as effective as possible. We therefore lay great stress on the enforcement procedures. We ourselves have gone on the assumption that in reducing the lists the remaining controls would be made more effective. We have therefore welcomed the statement made this morning by the United Kingdom representative that they were taking steps to introduce transaction controls. The Group may not be aware that we ourselves have taken action already in this connection. Additional powers have been obtained for control of the trade in strategic equipment and materials in Canada. An Act was passed by both Houses of Parliament and given Royal Assent on the 26th March last. It will become an offence under this Act for any person to do anything in Canada that causes or assists shipment or diversion of strategic materials to the Soviet Bloc whether from Canada or from any other country. The significance of this is that Canada has obtained authority and is imposing transaction controls.

Having taken this step, the Canadian Government will be anxious to see other participating countries do what is necessary to bring into effect adequate controls on the trade as referred to in the report by the Chairman of COCOM this morning.

Following for D. Harvey from H.B. Scully, Begins: Conversation with the United States delegation and the Chairman of COCOM points to close and detailed consideration being given to the question of all classes of shipping commencing Tuesday afternoon May 18, in conjunction with the overall review of transportation equipment. The United States delegate expects to be in telephone conversation with Washington on this subject today for final instructions in the event they decide to include in the review, discussion of the joint United Kingdom-United States memoranda on fishing vessels and merchant shipping plus existing deficiencies of the present exception procedures, 3d, etc.,† with the object of achieving agreement on a fair, realistic and effective form of control in this field related to the contents of your telegram No. 223.†

If Washington decides to go ahead on this basis, I have instructed him to ask his authority in Washington to acquaint Guy Smith accordingly so that he could phone Ottawa and ensure that your instructions and comments on this important subject will reach me in time for the Tuesday afternoon meeting.

Meantime, Naval Headquarters in Ottawa has informed the Canadian Naval Mission in London that they may send an officer to Paris to act as a technical adviser in the forthcoming talks and arrangements have been made for him to arrive on Monday morning so that he may be thoroughly acquainted with the issues involved and his possible function in the discussions based on the contents of your telegram No. 243.†

Before his despatch to Paris, I have requested the London staff to satisfy themselves that the presence of a service expert has the approval of External, Trade and Commerce and JIB.

No reply has yet been received on this point in my letter 726 of May 5. Presumably, detailed instructions at least on the transportation equipment category review will arrive Monday but we should have your instructions and comments on the implications of the broader concept referred to by that date if advice from Guy Smith indicates that the United States will raise this issue in the discussions. Ends.

LETTER NO. 846

Paris, May 25, 1954

EXPORT CONTROLS — COCOM — TRANSPORTATION EQUIPMENT

Listed below are the preliminary indicative results of reclassification discussions of this category held during the week of May 17th.

Quantitative Control — Fishing Vessels

No agreement was reached on quantitative control for fishing vessels owing to major objections by Denmark with the Netherlands to the proposed annual ceiling of 50 units, reference 1614.00/1. Belgium stated that although not in favour of such a control, they did not oppose it and went on to state that in their view, good grounds existed for larger quotas and larger sizes of vessels. The balance of the Committee supported the joint United Kingdom-United States proposals.

Quantitative Control — Merchant Vessels

No agreement on the United Kingdom or United States proposals was reached due to objections by Denmark and the Netherlands against any control of non-embargoed merchant vessels. Compared to the area of agreement on fishing vessels, where all but two delegations were ready to accept the U.K.-U.S. proposals, there were wider differences in this field. Those accepting a ceiling tonnage ranged from the United States and ourselves, agreeable to an 88,000 ton figure to the United Kingdom 200,000 tons. The French delegate, as a working basis for a compromise, proposed a ceiling of 130,000 tons for quota allocation plus 50,000 tons to be made available through pre-consultation on a strict quid pro quo basis. This failed to receive acceptance and no agreement was possible on a tonnage figure for allocation.

In spite of the wide area of disagreement, there was some evidence of a spirit of compromise, for instance, the United States as well as the United Kingdom could envisage a ceiling of 140,000 to 160,000 tons as a basis for discussion. The majority agreed that a check on further deliveries to the Bloc should be made at an agreed "Amber Light point" in tonnage, for example, at 120,000 if the figure of 160,000 were accepted for a ceiling.

There was also agreement by the majority against prior consultation up to the agreed danger point and after such a point it was felt prior consultation rather than quid pro quo should be the guiding principle.

In conclusion, it was obvious that no further discussion before the C.G. meeting would be held unless one or more delegates and particularly the Netherlands and Denmark concluded that on the outlines of a possible compromise as to ceiling, etc., further discussion might be constructive and work towards an acceptance of a quota agreement for merchant vessels. If agreement in this field can be reached, it was felt that fishing vessels agreement would likely follow.

In view of the dislike for the present system of control which, in the event of the present disagreement will maintain at least until the subject is again reviewed after the Consultative Group meeting, perhaps September at the earliest, there was a body of opinion favouring some further discussion aimed at reaching agreement.

As opportune, we made known our views, reference your telegram No. 245 of May 14th and stressed our concern with respect to the basis on which COCOM quota would operate together with our concern that the present prior notification, exception procedure and 3D application, should be brought into line with the current trend in International trade and trade agreements.

EXPORT CONTROLS — COCOM — SHIPPING

Following for D. Harvey from Scully, Begins: The United Kingdom delegate has just handed me the summary of the proposed plan for controls on non-embargoed ships and fishing vessels which is quoted in full below in view of the importance of this question scheduled for discussion on June 23rd.

"A. Vessels other than fishing vessels:

1. A "hard" ceiling of 150,000 GRT a year for three years, with any vessel over 20 years of age counted at one-half its tonnage. Charges would be made against the quota for the year of delivery. Any unused portion of the yearly quota may be carried over to the next year but there should be no borrowing against the future quota.

2. This quota would not be allocated among member governments, but would be used in accordance with the principles and procedures below.

3. Even though not allocated, it is expected that the global quota will in practice be shared equitably by all interested countries, taking into account all relevant considerations.

4. Subject to the special procedure in paragraph 5 below, individual governments may use up to 20 percent (30,000 GRT) of the annual quota, being entitled to use four-fifths (24,000 GRT) of this portion, without advance notice to the Committee but with prompt ex post facto notification, and to use the remaining fifth (6,000 GRT) of this portion only after prior notification to the Committee, together with a "3(D)" justification. In the latter type of case, other member governments may offer comments within 14 calendar days, if they desire.

5. When the charges against the global quota for any year total 120,000 GRT, a general review will be undertaken. In addition, commitments against the balance of that quota may be made only after prior notification to the Committee, together with a "3(D)" justification. Other member governments may offer comments within 14 calendar days, if they desire.

6. The Committee should be notified of repair work done in a member country on a Soviet ship, if the work is valued at over $100,000.

7. In addition, major rebuilding, overhaul or completion work on a Soviet vessel — i.e. work valued at $100 per GRT or more — should be charged against the above quota for the year of completion, on the basis of 50 percent of the GRT of the vessel.

8. To facilitate continuous notification to the Committee of charges against the ceiling, uniform reporting forms should be developed by the Committee and cumulative monthly summaries should be prepared and circulated by the Secretariat.

9. These control arrangements — including the continuation of the yearly quota — are subject to annual review, which may be combined with the general review at the 120,000-ton point or may be handled separately, depending on circumstances.

B. Fishing vessels

1. A "hard" ceiling of 50 fishing vessels a year for three years, with any vessel over 20 years of age counted as one-half vessel. Charges would be made against the quota for the year of delivery.

2. This quota would not be allocated among member governments, but would be used in accordance with the same principles as for merchant vessels above and the procedures below.

3. Individual governments may use up to 20 percent (10 vessels) of the annual quota. For the first four-fifths (8 vessels) of this portion, and subject to the special procedure in paragraph 4 below, orders may be accepted without advance notice to the Committee but with prompt ex post facto notification. For the remaining fifth (2 vessels) of this portion, and subject to the special procedure in paragraph 4 below, orders may be accepted only after prior notification to the Committee. It is not thought necessary that a "3(D)" justification be provided in this case but this question could be discussed in the Committee. Other member governments may offer comments within 14 calendar days, if they desire.

4. When the charges against the global quota for any year total 40 vessels, a general review will be undertaken. In addition, commitments against the balance of that quota may be made only after prior notification to the Committee. As in the case of paragraph 3 above, "3(D)" justification is not thought necessary. Other member governments may offer comments within 14 calendar days, if they desire.

5. The provisions in paragraphs A-8 and 9 above, concerning reporting and annual review, would apply to fishing vessels also."

In a brief private conversation with the British delegate, in which I emphasized a number of the points with which we were concerned, (COCOM 1614, paragraphs 20 and 21) he stated that although not shown in the proposal, it was understood that a recommendation would be made in the Committee that a running record be kept of Soviet acquisitions from all COCOM sources concurrent with the utilization of the quotas established. He intimated that the United States delegation had already given their concurrence to the above proposal. May we have your comments and instructions on this subject not later than Monday p.m. At the meeting of June 23rd, every effort will be made to secure agreement on some acceptable form of quota control in order to solve the present impasse described in COCOM 1614.00/5 and mentioned in our letter No. 846 of May 25.

COCOM SHIPPING CONTROLS

Following for Scully, Begins: Further to my telegram No. 243 of May 13† containing instructions on vessel and marine part items, the following paragraphs are intended to provide you with more general guidance.

2. The United States delegate may propose postponing the review of vessels until after July 1. If he does, you may support this moratorium idea, but we do not expect it would be popular with the Europeans.

3. The Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy has now considered the memorandum on sales of ships to the Soviet bloc, of which a copy was sent to you on April 28. The Committee appeared to be in agreement with it, and a further memorandum is being prepared for Cabinet covering conclusions 1, 2 and 3, which relate only to the domestic Canadian situation. The memorandum will take into account the results of next week's COCOM review.

4. As you know, we are much more concerned with the fundamental issues and broad implications of shipping controls than with details of definitions, cut-off levels, etc., for particular types of embargo treatment. Our attitude has consistently been that almost all vessels have potential naval auxiliary uses, some being more dangerous to the West than others. We, therefore, favour the continuation of some adequate and effective system for controlling Soviet Bloc acquisitions, from whatever sources. If it appears that the application of the Listing Guide criteria might encourage moves towards an excessive relaxation of controls, we would hope that the majority of Participating Countries might agree to treat vessels as a rather special commodity, having a useful life of thirty to forty years and not (repeat not) apply too liberally and rigidly the Listing Guides during next week's review.

5. You will recall from para. 2 of our telegram No. 74 of February 26† that we have recognized the present inadequacy of 3(d) procedures in the case of vessels. We concede that they do not cover the position of the United Kingdom or, for that matter, the United States and Canada, and so we would accept a broadening of the exception criteria to include political, commercial and other non-strategic factors (balance of payments, unemployment, etc.). (See also paras. 3 and 4 of my telegram No. 74.)

6. In the light of the apparent desire of many P.C.'s to break away from the old control system, we would not expect you to stand out for more strict controls over ships than the United States delegation does. We expect them to put forward new proposals next week, and they may drop the joint United States-United Kingdom proposals in Document 1516 because they have been unable to agree with the United Kingdom about a quota figure. At an appropriate stage you may indicate that the U.S. proposals seem generally reasonable. In particular we could support paras. 4 (a), (d) and (e) on page 2 of a draft dated May 4, of which a copy has been given to us and which the United States delegate could show you.

7. Concerning paras. (b) and (c) of the draft, which propose an annual quota of 88,000 G.R.T. for the Paris group only, either allocated nationally or left unallocated, you may indicate that, if the majority appear to favour it, we would be willing to accept the quota control idea in principle, subject to certain reservations listed below, and on the condition that the resultant controls would be effective and sincerely implemented by all Participating Countries.

8. As you know from our telegram No. 124 of March 23,[†] we have many misgivings about the quota system, and you should make known the following more serious reservations:

(a) We consider it essential that whatever quota limits are set, there should at the very least be prior notification of each proposed sale with an explanation of the supporting reasons, starting from the beginning of the quota. Naturally, we would prefer prior consultation and approval on the basis of some liberalized and broadened 3(d) procedure, but we recognize the European countries would be unlikely to accept such restrictions until after the quota ceiling is reached. In this view we would expect to be supported by the Danish delegation, for we have some sympathy with the position they took in para. 21 of Document 1527. (Incidentally, the statement you made in a personal capacity in para. 39 of that Document did not (repeat not) reflect our thinking here. When we accepted the quota idea in principle, it was not because we thought it a better one, but because we thought the old system was no longer working). In the circumstances, we would find it very difficult to accept the suggestion in para. (c) of the United States draft proposal that deliveries within the quota limits need not be justified or even notified in advance at all.

(b) Instead of an annual quota being set for Participating Countries only, we consider it should be global and take into account Soviet Bloc construction and acquisitions from non-COCOM sources as well, since what we are, and logically the other COCOM countries should be, primarily concerned about is the rate of growth and modernization of the whole Soviet Bloc fleet, regardless of the sources of additions to that fleet. As a practical matter, it would seem unrealistic to limit deliveries from one group of countries without taking into account other sources of supply. The whole control apparatus could be disrupted or broken down by unexpected Soviet purchases outside the Paris group, or a change in their own shipbuilding programmes. If the majority favour a quota system of some kind, we would like you to invite the views of the other Member Countries on their determinations of the limits, either in terms of total tonnage or units, or permissible Soviet Bloc acquisitions from all sources beyond which the vital security interests of the free world would clearly be imperilled. These calculations could presumably be expressed as a range to reflect the opinions of the more and the less cautious countries.

(c) It follows from (b) above that we would not (repeat not) be satisfied with a quota set for Participating Countries alone. Beginning anew each year we would prefer to see a running total kept in COCOM of all Soviet acquisitions, and each additional COCOM sale should be considered as an increment to the accumulated total at about the time of delivery. As the upper limit of the quota were approached, or say the lower figure in the dangerous range mentioned at the end of (b) above, additional sales should be scrutinized more rigorously. For example, any COCOM deliveries made before the first 100,000 tons of shipping are acquired each year by the Soviet Bloc from all sources might simply be notified and explained, but after that total is reached each year, prior approval by COCOM could be required. All this implies a pooling of intelligence information about Soviet Bloc construction and outside purchases, and also the practicability of arriving at agreement on the facts regarding additions to the running total.

(d) If the majority insist on setting a quota for Participating Countries alone and on dividing it up nationally, notwithstanding our contrary arguments, you should press for the quota to be so apportioned as to leave unallocated a significant reserve tonnage on which countries like Canada having no national quota should have the first claim, and which could only be used after prior consultation and approval. You should also tell COCOM that it would be intolerable for our Government to have to tell Canadian shipbuilders that they could not have export permits for ships similar to those European countries may be selling. Because of our high shipbuilding costs, it is unlikely that any such sales would actually develop, but if they did we would expect to have access to the global quota just as freely as our COCOM partners.

9. We feel the foregoing instructions are in line with our best interests, both security and commercial, and are the most useful contribution we could hope to make to the solution of this problem. Ends.

COCOM — SHIPPING CONTROLS

For your own information we were disappointed to learn of the failure of COCOM to reach agreement on this important subject in the week of May 17, and have been disturbed by the fact that Denmark, Norway and the Netherlands, which are such close neighbours of Russia, are the very countries opposing effective quota controls at reasonably low levels. As you know, our views in the past (telegram No. 245 of May 14) were based on the assumption that our European COCOM partners would be at least as sensitive to their own security interests as we have tried to be and would consider these controls important from that point of view.

2. Our position in the record is clear, and we feel there is nothing more we can do now than encourage COCOM P.C.'s to reach whatever agreement they can as soon as possible, on the grounds that if they don't agree on something soon we run a risk of ending up with no quota controls at all.

3. In these circumstances, we would gladly lend our full support on June 23 to the new United Kingdom proposals, and we earnestly hope that all the other P.C.'s will be able to accept them also.

4. You should, however, indicate our understanding that the 3(d) type of justification (paragraph 4) would in future be much broader in scope than that detailed in Document 370 (see paragraph 5 of our telegram No. 245 for our views on this). You should also express our concern at the possibility, in theory at least, that the proposed United Kingdom system could break down if, for example,

(a) more than five countries were to authorize their ship builders to sign firm contracts for up to 24,000 tons all in the early stages before each country realized what the others were doing, or

(b) the global quota were used up within a short period and the Soviet Bloc then acquired substantial numbers of ships from non-COCOM sources.

However, that is a chance that would have to be taken, and we are content to hope that the optimism in paragraph 3 of the United Kingdom proposal is justified by events.

EXPORT CONTROLS — COCOM — C.G. MEETING

Following for D. Harvey from Scully, Begins: At today's meeting, the United States supported by the United Kingdom requested a postponement of the Consultative Group meeting to July 19 and 20th so that additional time will be available to P.C.'s in which a further effort could be made to reduce the extensive list of disagreed items.

In this connection, it was pointed out that the recently concluded second review had not had the hoped-for results but that some progress had been made in narrowing the field of disagreement. In fact, of the 92 items involved, (excluding shipping) 7 were agreed for embargo, 5 for quantitative control, 10 for surveillance, 10 item numbers were deleted in which the item itself had been redefined by inclusion into 5 remaining items. 60 items therefore remain unresolved comprising 42 embargoed items, 15 quantitative control and 3 surveillance.

In private conversation with both the United States and the United Kingdom delegates, it was apparent that they feel the meeting of July 8th would be inconclusive in the very sensitive field of disagreed items and that one more effort should be made with the object of at least reducing the area of disagreement to perhaps, 10 or 12 items.

We supported the suggested postponement, subject to confirmation of the new date which has now been found acceptable to Mr. Wilgress.

As a preliminary of any further discussion of disagreed items, it is likely that talks will take place in London and Washington with the object of endeavouring to establish an atmosphere of reconciliation through a joint memorandum by the United States and the United Kingdom. There is no indication yet as to what procedure will be followed here in Paris but in the event of any further item discussions, we shall be guided by your previous instructions and will assume that in instances where the United States sees fit to modify its position, we shall follow suit in the interest of achieving unanimous agreement wherever possible.

Views of governments on the new date are to be given Monday morning July 5th. In view of the availability of Mr. Wilgress, we propose to concur in the new date. Ends.

COCOM SHIPPING CONTROLS

Following for Scully, Begins: We would be grateful to have your personal opinions on the likelihood of the shipping control problem being discussed and agreement reached during the Consultative Group meetings on July 19. We would like to know your views because we are giving some thought to the desirability of intervening in the matter as continuation of the old control system would be disadvantageous to Canada if other countries cease to respect the 3(d) principle and we remain bound by it.

CONSULTATIVE GROUP MEETING, JULY 19TH-20TH

You asked for some comments on COCOM Document 1650 which was enclosed with Despatch 1047 of June 30th, attached.† The following comments relate to the C.G. Agenda.

Item II—Review of International Lists and of Enforcement Procedures

(a) Agreement has been reached during the course of the COCOM Review over the past two and a half months on all but 60 items, of which 42 are on List 1, 15 on List 2, and 3 on List 3. This is a rather formidable "hard core" for the C.G. to cope with. My feeling is that it is not for External Affairs to take the lead in dealing with these unresolved items. We have in the past preferred to leave it to Trade and Commerce and the Joint Intelligence Bureau, and have limited our concern to (1) not being more strict than the United States, (2) protecting Canada's position, (3) encouraging speedy agreement by a readiness to compromise and accept the majority wishes.

(b) Thirty-seven items would come under List 2 — Quantitative Controls, and these will probably give serious trouble. In the past 3(d) procedures have governed exceptions to quantitative controls, but these are no longer workable. For example, the United Kingdom has for the past six months been insisting that sterling payments constitute 3(d) justification. This sort of thing is becoming widespread among COCOM governments, and is a distortion of the original concept of assessing on which side the preponderance of strategic (as distinct from commercial) advantage lies. In general, we have been tending to favour a modernization of the outdated 3(d) procedure, but we have preferred to avoid the issue as much as possible by keeping to a minimum the number of items on List 2. For example, instead of seeking a quota for alpha cellulose, we advocated its down-grading off List 2 altogether. It should be recognized, moreover, that once a quota is admitted as a necessity for any commodity which can also be produced in the Soviet bloc or acquired from other non-COCOM sources, the case for rigid adherence and strict controls is greatly weakened. I feel we should not become too entangled in disputes about List 2 items, but should save our big guns for:

(c) Transaction and Trans-shipment Controls. In this we can fully support Trade and Commerce and the United States. We have always said in COCOM that the control procedures and effective enforcement are on a par with the international lists themselves in importance.

(d) Introduction of new lists before assurances of implementation of the enforcement procedures are given by all C.Ps. The interrelation between these two matters is brought out by their being lumped together as the first substantive agenda item. Together they constitute a truly vexatious problem. We know the United Kingdom and their friends have been making substantial reductions of the international lists a prior condition to the introduction of effective transaction and trans-shipment controls, and it would be just as obviously a tactical manoeuvre on our part to try to delay the introduction of the reduced revised lists in the hope of speeding European acceptance of the T.A.C. etc.²¹ I doubt very much whether we are in a strong enough position to get away with such behaviour, especially as we have agreed to the reduced lists per se. I also doubt that the United Kingdom pressures for relaxation can be kept in restraint much longer. While not wishing to follow in the footsteps of Cassandra, I nevertheless feel bound to suggest that the future prospects of COCOM as a harmoniously functioning piece of international machinery would appear very dim indeed if the United States and the United Kingdom cannot agree within the next month or so on such issues as this one.

(e) Shipping controls may come under consideration by the C.G. as Item 2415 is one of the most important of the many unresolved List 2 commodities. Arthur Neal may bring up for discussion an idea of his that Mr. Wilgress, by personally intervening in Paris, might somehow save the day for shipping controls. Quite honestly, I am skeptical of this possibility. The European governments are already deeply committed, and my feeling is that the problem has developed far beyond the power of individual personalities to influence seriously at this late stage in Paris. Moreover, it would be inconsistent with Mr. C.D. Howe's wishes for us to step off the sidelines. Besides I do not think Canada has been sufficiently detached or unconcerned with the shipping problem over the past four years for our voice as an "honest broker" to be heeded now.

Item III — Questions of Strategic Controls on Exports to Communist China and North Korea

I am not convinced that we should be as aggressive about this as Denis Harvey seems to be, but nevertheless I do think that we should support a reduction of the CHICOM levels of control to those of COCOM, purely as a matter of common sense and economic rationality. As long as we hold off such a concession, however, we might be able to bargain a little more effectively with the United Kingdom and others about imposing transaction and trans-shipment controls as quickly as possible. Also in the case of the disagreed items the China controls should be given the benefit of the doubt.

Item IV — Other Business

(a) Secrecy. I see no harm in the publication of the COCOM lists or of details of the transaction and trans-shipment control schemes as our own. Other countries would presumably do the same. Owing to leaks over the past year there is not much

²¹ L'objet des certificats d'autorisation de transit était de veiller à ce que les marchandises contrôlées ne puissent pas être détournées vers une nouvelle destination à leur arrivée à l'intérieur des frontières des pays participants.

The purpose of the Transit Authorization Certificate scheme was to ensure that controlled goods could not be diverted to a new destination on arrival within the boundaries of participating countries.

secrecy left about COCOM but I think it would be politically preferable for each country to offer the COCOM lists as its own national controls rather than as an international list.

(b) Austrian Watch List. On this I have no comments.

EXPORT CONTROLS — COCOM SHIPPING CONTROLS

At today's meeting, the United States delegate notified the Committee that at the meeting of July 16, they might wish to make a statement. Obviously this would be based on the outcome of the joint talks recently concluded in Washington between Mr. Thorneycroft and Mr. Stassen. The United States delegation has intimated to me that there was not the degree of reconciliation hoped for in the talks but that there appeared some hope for reduction of the lengthy list of disagreed items mentioned in my telegram No. 266(CC-85) of July 2.

Private conversations with both the United Kingdom and the United States delegates have indicated that efforts are being made in capitals especially Copenhagen and The Hague to effect a basis for a compromise aimed at achieving a solution to the shipping control problem.

The results of such efforts, supplemental to the joint talks in Washington will be apparent, owing to the time factor, only at the C.G. meeting.

While the shipping control problem will certainly be discussed in C.G., the most we can look for is an exchange of views perhaps modified as a result of the present impasse so as to establish a basis on which COCOM would be instructed to again review the shipping control problem and bring forward recommendations.

Such an exchange in C.G. would provide us an opportunity of expressing our concern over the inadequacies of the present 3D principle, etc., coupled perhaps with a request that this question be reviewed by COCOM at an early date with the object of putting the old procedures in step with present day conditions.

There is some divergence in local press reports of the Washington talks, the consensus being that only mediocre results were achieved and this is perhaps borne out by the fact that there has been no move for a last minute review of the existing disagreed items in the week remaining before the C.G. meeting.

CONSULTATIVE GROUP MEETING

Following for Scully (Embassy please pass copy to Mr. Wilgress), Begins: Officials of External and Trade and Commerce have been giving some preliminary thought to what our attitude should be to the various items slated for discussion on July 19. Naturally, much will depend upon the outcome of talks now going on between the U.S., and the U.K., Portuguese, Danish and Netherlands Governments. Subject to whatever modifications of our views may be rendered necessary within the next week by these negotiations, our tentative opinions are the following, and your comments would be welcome:

(1) Lists: We would like to see the revised Lists (to the extent already agreed upon) implemented as quickly as possible. While we are not unmindful of the pressures we could perhaps exercise on the U.K. and French concerning early implementation of transaction controls etc. by delaying adoption of the new Lists, we consider on balance that it would be to Canada's advantage to accept the Lists promptly and take our chances on the willingness of other P.C.'s to adopt the improvements in the enforcement procedures with the least possible delay.

(2) Exception Procedures: You are familiar with our desire to have these brought up to date with present-day conditions by taking into account such non-strategic factors as unemployment, balance-of-payment difficulties, etc. It follows that we would not expect to take the List II quite as seriously from now on as we have in the past, and will concentrate our main efforts on achieving effective enforcement of the List I Embargoes.

(3) Disagreed Items: Apart from aluminum and shipping, we would not propose to play an active part in resolving these problems. The other items are not of vital significance to Canada, and so we would rather limit our concern to promoting harmony in COCOM and the widest possible measure of agreement of the Lists.

(4) China List: We have been cautious about this in the past and intend to go on being that way, avoiding involvement over this critical issue. We are most anxious to compete for publicity in the current U.S.-U.K. dispute. Nevertheless, we could no longer give the U.S. the kind of support we did before the Geneva meetings began. We doubt that there would be any political advantage to be gained at this late stage which would off-set the commercial disadvantages to Portugal, Japan, and others involved in the continuation of the special China List. In the

Consultative Group Meeting, therefore, we plan to take the line that there is no strategic justification in treating China and North Korea as a bloc commercially distinct from the rest of the communist world, and that we would agree to bringing the COCOM and CHICOM lists into line.²²

From this distance, we have formed an impression that there is serious danger that COCOM may break down this year under the strain of divisive influences. This might happen if either (a) Portugal withholds agreement to implementing revised COCOM Lists and other P.C.'s put them into effect anyway or (b) Portugal abandons the Special China List without the consent of the other P.C.'s.

Because of these fears, Trade and Commerce is approaching the U.S. Embassy informally to learn (i) whether they share our misgivings over the future prospects for COCOM,²³ (ii) if so, how far would they be prepared to compromise with the Portuguese to save COCOM (assuming Portugal could not be brought into line by any threat to cut off U.S. aid), and (iii) would they welcome Canadian intervention aimed at some form of compromise?²⁴

(5) Shipping Controls: In the light of your 279 of July 9 we can only wait and hope for the best, while lending our support to any proposals acceptable to the majority. We had toyed briefly with the idea of intervening as an honest broker, but don't feel there would be enough hope of achieving something constructive to warrant such action. Strategic reasons aside, we are most anxious for some control system along the lines of the U.K. draft to be accepted because it would become increasingly embarrassing to bind ourselves indefinitely to the strict 3(d) rules which are not readily applicable to our situation, while European competitors interpret these same rules more flexibly to their own commercial advantage.²⁵

While on this subject, with reference to your despatch 1067 of July 2,† we would not stand in the way of the Japanese if that would help to secure general acceptance of the hoped-for future controls within whose framework all COCOM sales should take place.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR CONSULTATIVE GROUP MEETING

We have just concluded some frank and friendly discussions begun yesterday with officials from Washington from which the following main points emerged:

(1) General: Bilateral United States talks with the Danes and Portuguese, have so far been inconclusive and therefore have no direct bearing on what follows.

(2) COCOM Lists: We learned that the current Geneva negotiations on Indo-China are casting their shadow over Washington where U.S. COCOM thinking is still fluid even at this late date. They expect to reach a decision only at the eleventh hour (perhaps not before Monday morning) on either agreeing to implement, or seeking to delay the adoption of, the reduced Lists. You should therefore keep in close touch with the U.S. Delegation. The determining factor for the U.S. Government apparently will be whether a settlement in Indo-China satisfactory to the U.S. (the officials could not elaborate on this) comes into view by Monday or Tuesday, or whether the situation takes a marked turn for the worse.

In the latter event the whole "long-haul" concept of the cold war might be set aside on second thoughts by the United States, and in COCOM they would consequently work towards a complete reversal of the trend towards relaxing controls evident since the Berlin meetings earlier this year.

If you are confronted with a determined U.S. move to defer implementation of the reduced COCOM Lists because of the possible unfavourable political and symbolic implications of such relaxations to the Geneva truce talks, we would not expect you to stand out in opposition. If the U.K. and other P.C's agree, you could of course accept a temporary deferment of the issue until another CG meeting can be held later on in more auspicious circumstances. If that happened, we doubt if anyone would expect this CG Meeting to accomplish anything useful.

Assuming, however, that the U.S. will be prepared to proceed with the CG discussions on Monday we would expect that their position will be to lump together for COCOM acceptance as a package deal the following items, the first three of which are interrelated:

- (a) implementation of the reduced lists;
- (b) adoption of tighter enforcement procedures (Transshipment and Transaction Controls, etc.);

(c) acceptance of U.K. Document 1670 on the unresolved items;

(d) indefinite deferment of serious considerations of the Portuguese suggestion for reducing the special China List to the COCOM levels.

We could support the U.S. on acceptance en bloc of (a) (b) and (c) above to the same extent as the U.K. and others are willing to do so. Point (d) is dealt with below.

(3) China List: We were somewhat surprised at the apparent complacency of the Americans over the threat to COCOM's future we envisaged in the Portuguese stand. They did not seem to be unduly concerned and doubted that the Portuguese would strain the rule of unanimity to the breaking point just to get their own way.

For our part in our talks with the U.S. we elaborated our misgivings over the effects on Western security of having two separate levels of control for areas which are linked by well established lines of communication. As an example, we pointed out the illogicality of Japan's being allowed to ship to Vladivostok commodities not on COCOM Lists I or II which could then move freely down to China, while at the same time Japan could not sell them directly to China. The only alternative would appear to be for Japan to apply the China List to her trade with the Soviet Maritime Provinces. The Americans seemed to think that something like this would happen in practice.

Concerning the related question of shipments from Gdynia by sea, the Americans suggested that their Delegation might lay before the CG Meeting some administrative proposals for preventing transshipments to China via the Soviet Bloc of items on the China List but not on the COCOM Lists, but they were unable to clarify this idea and we were rather sceptical. We encountered a certain lack of realism in U.S. thinking on this point amounting almost to an unwillingness to face the facts. They appeared to be very much under the influence of their own domestic situation which as you know involves a complete embargo on trade with China. We had to agree to differ on this point, for our attitude was that it would be difficult or impossible to enforce measures designed by the U.S. to uphold the artificial distinctions for trade purposes between the Eastern Soviet and Far Eastern Communist blocs.

We learned at this stage of important leaks of strategic goods to China via Macao, and expressed our concern, lest the Portuguese, if balked over a reduction of the China List, should continue to honour it more in the breach than in the observance. To us it is important for some compromise to be devised for closing as far as possible the gap between the U.S. and Portuguese positions. We discussed very briefly the desirability of your playing the role of an honest broker by virtue of the greater flexibility and objectivity of the Canadian position than that of the U.S. We left it for you to exercise your discretion over this possibility, and if (but only if) the U.S. and U.K. delegates indicate that it might stand a chance, you might take the initiative in trying to work out something constructive. The only hints we can give you from this distance are that the nature of any acceptable compromise would have to reflect the judgment of the majority of P.C's on the question of timing. There should be general recognition that the China List needs to be reviewed sooner or later, but there is much to be said for making haste slowly at this time. In order of gradualness, possible compromises might involve directives from the CG to CHICOM to:

(a) carry out a substantive review of the China List using criteria to be agreed upon;

(b) merely consolidate the present multiplicity of international lists applicable to China;

(c) carry out a mere editorial review of the China List alone.

We need hardly say that if you have any doubts about the wisdom and usefulness of a personal intervention, we would prefer you to stay out of the dispute and let someone else do the peacemaking.

(a) Ships: The United Kingdom have just solicited our support for what they think is a compromise the Danes and Dutch might be willing to accept. It is based on a 200,000 ton ceiling and 16 knot speed limit.

The U.S. and U.K. seem to doubt whether the Soviet Bloc would buy ships in excess of that limit any way, but if that were so the U.S. feel there would be no point at all in COCOM setting such high quota. We therefore have no incentive to support the latest U.K. proposals. Moreover, even if the Danes accept the U.K. suggestion, the U.S. will not repeat not (especially with respect to the speed maximum), and in these circumstances Canadian support or opposition would make almost no difference one way or the other. Consequently we would like you to be rather passive about this if shipping is discussed by the CG. If pressed for an opinion (and you might say as much in any advance conversations with the U.K. delegate), you should indicate our unwillingness to support the U.K. proposal. If all other countries were prepared to accept it (or some modification of it) we would be willing to agree in keeping with our general objective of preserving unity in COCOM. The disagreement is not between us and the U.K., but ostensibly between the U.S. and Denmark, and we intend to stay out of it.

Certain specific points discussed with the U.S. are reported on in my following telegram.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR CONSULTATIVE GROUP MEETING

We are reporting below separately on certain items which were discussed with United States officials today and yesterday. Begins:

Unresolved Items

We were informed that the U.K. and the U.S. have now reached agreement on most of the unresolved items. The Americans still have some questions regarding the alloying content of stainless steel. In this they are at present opposed to the French views which involve a large permissible content of alloying elements. We have no further comment to offer in addition to that already supplied to the COCOM delegate. In general, we will support the majority views particularly if they command both U.K. and U.S. approval. We have not yet received Doc. 1670.

Transaction Controls

The Americans expressed the view that the French will not press their objections on the ground of conflicts with M.F.N. obligations. They are hopeful that the French views respecting the difficulties of identifying goods can be overcome. The U.K. has indicated that it is now prepared to introduce Transaction Controls even if all countries do not put the Transit Authorization Scheme into effect at once. Canada of course favours the introduction of both by all P.C.'s as soon as possible.

Quotas and Exceptions Procedures

We agreed generally that exceptions should be minimized, that quotas on List 2 items should be kept at a realistic level in relation to security risks and that all or part of the quotas should remain unallocated. It was agreed that the quota procedures as outlined in COCOM documents 470 and 471 should be reviewed. This is a subject which in all probability should be referred to the COCOM to be worked out in detail. The U.S. also understand that questions may be raised concerning the establishment of interim quotas for List 2 items pending the time when these can be given fuller consideration by the COCOM. We did not offer specific comment on this other than to recognize it as a problem. The magnitude of the problem is minimized by the fact that List 2 does not contain many items.

Secrecy

Two aspects of this question were discussed. The first involved a question on the publicity that will be given to the new lists. It is understood that most of the countries will find it necessary to publish lists. There is no need, however, to identify it as an International List but they could be represented in each country as a National List. When the Transit Authorization Scheme and the Transaction Controls are put into effect it would be useful if the names of the cooperating countries could be published. It was agreed, however, that neither the U.S. nor Canada wished to embarrass the other participating countries by disclosing information the latter wished to withhold. If there is objection to publishing a list of countries participating in the two control schemes, other expedients could be found. Ends.

EXPORT CONTROLS — COCOM — CONSULTATIVE GROUP MEETING

Following for D. Harvey from H.B. Scully, Begins: Although the consultative group meeting just concluded did not resolve all outstanding points of difference generally speaking, an encouraging degree of agreement was reached on most of the main subjects.

1. List review

At this morning's meeting, it was generally agreed as a result of the decision reached in Geneva, that implementation of the Co-ordinating Committee's recommendations based on the list review should be effective on August 16. The United States only were unprepared to accept this date but agreed to inform the participating countries of their stand not later than July 27.

The Portuguese delegation withdrew their reservation (COCOM Document No. 1582) to implementation when they received the assurance of the group that requests for exceptions to the China list that they might submit from time to time would receive sympathetic consideration. Such requests for exception would be handled through notification to and discussion in the China Committee with respect to MACAO only and would relate solely to items affected by the discrepancies now existing between the China list and the new international lists about to be implemented. In connection with the lists, there are a few items without substantial significance to Canada, stood over for some further discussion, for example item 1650.

2. Fishing vessels

The question of shipping was put in the hands of a working group and the fishing vessel quota was resolved as follows:

On the understanding that fishing vessels over 20 years of age would be counted as half units and fishing vessels of less than 130 feet in length would also be counted as half units, it proved possible to agree to the following allocation:

FISHING VESSELS
BELGIUM	7	JAPAN	6
DENMARK	7	NETHERLANDS	4
FRANCE	5	NORWAY	4

GERMANY	7	UNITED KINGDOM	9
ITALY	4	UNALLOCATED RESERVE	2
			55

It was a general understanding that although the allocation had been made in respect of the yearly quota the quota would be considered as a three-yearly one covering the years 1954 1955 1956. This was approved by the consultative group and in view of the agreement reached on quota, Denmark withdrew its reservation on the list 1 definitions with the result that the whole fishing vessel question is now settled. Your attention is drawn to the unallocated reserve on which we insisted, amounting to two vessels annually. It should be noted in connection with the foregoing figures that several countries notably United Kingdom and Norway in presenting previous submissions for trawlers undertook to apply their orders against whatever future quota was established. These amounted to 20 units in the case of the United Kingdom and 2 for Norway.

3. Merchant ships

Owing to the firm position taken by Denmark it was impossible to reach agreement on a merchant shipping quota but under pressure from the other fourteen delegations, Denmark did agree that the embargo aspects other than speed should be brought into force at once. They refused to alter their position on speed holding out for 16 knots. Finally the Danish delegate made two alternative proposals:

(a) That there should be an unallocated quota with a soft ceiling over which there should be application of the 3(d) procedure possibly with prior consultation or,

(b) That the quota should be fixed on a somewhat lower level and allocated nation by nation, but that exports should be allowed by individual countries above these national quotas in accordance with the 3(d) procedure. And said he could in no circumstances accept an unallocated quota with a hard ceiling. Both we and the United Kingdom stated that the Danish proposals were unacceptable while other delegates said they had no instructions on which to express an opinion. Greece stated just as firmly that they could accept nothing but an unallocated quota. Eventually it was established that reasonable possibilities existed for establishment of an unallocated hard ceiling quota approximately of 550,000 tons with a speed limitation of 15.2 knots but Denmark refused to budge with the result that merchant shipping continues subject to the present procedure (3(d) etc.) and even here the Danes stated they did not intend to entirely abide by the unanimity rule but that they would only take action contrary to the wishes of the committee after careful consideration of all factors. Several delegates having stressed the fact that the present system was breaking down, it was decided that a consultative group meeting would convene on September 7 for the express purpose of again discussing the shipping question. In the interval, governments were requested to express their views on the two Danish proposals ((a) and (b) above) and to bring forward any further suggestions or plans likely to provide a basis for a shipping control consistent with the security interests of the west.

4. Enforcement

Following is the note and instruction issued to the Co-ordinating Committee concerning enforcement procedures and your attention is drawn to paragraph 2 particularly so that appropriate steps may be taken in the interval:

1. The consultative group notes that delegations have given unanimous approval to the "TAC" system of transit control described in annex A to COCOM Document No. 1643, and have therefore agreed that after a decision is reached to implement the reductions of the international lists, their governments will take the necessary steps to place the scheme in operation as promptly as administratively and legally possible and to introduce transaction controls if they do not already have transaction or financial controls in force;

2. To carry out the agreement in paragraph (1), the consultative group instructs the Co-ordinating Committee, as promptly as possible and in any case by the 1 October 1954, to co-ordinate the final technical details (including fixing the date) for implementing the TAC scheme, having in mind the desirability of the greatest possible degree of uniformity between the regulations of participating countries;

3. Without prejudice to the prompt fulfilment of the commitments recorded in paragraph 1 above, but with a view to the further improvement of the TAC scheme as described in COCOM Document No. 1643, the consultative group instructs the Co-ordinating Committee:

(a) To study the improvements which might be made in the TAC scheme, especially as concerns the measures required to facilitate identification of the strategic character as well as the origin of the goods;

(b) To examine the possibility for member governments to exchange experts who would study the conditions of implementation of the system and, in the light of experience, suggest how the system might be improved in order to make it more effective;

(c) To seek means to ensure that the implementation of the TAC scheme shall be compatible with the Most-Favoured-Nation clause which is contained in the agreements concluded between certain member governments and the Soviet bloc governments.

5. Quantitative control and surveillance quantitative control

The consultative group

1. Instructs the Co-ordinating Committee to review the existing list II procedure as set out in COCOM Document No. 470 and to submit recommendations for amendments at the next meeting of the consultative group.

2. Pending agreement on any changes, the existing procedure should apply to the new list II. In view of the necessity to agree control arrangements for immediate operation in the event of the new lists being implemented before new procedures have been worked out, the consultative group agreed that the first task of the Co-ordinating Committee after the recess should be to fix quotas or other quantitative control procedures for the new list II for the remainder of 1954 and for the year 1955; and that the Co-ordinating Committee should if possible complete this task by the 15 September. The consultative group therefore instructs the Co-ordinating Committee to adopt the following temporary measures:

(a) If agreement has not been reached by the 1 October, exports of these items which are now under embargo (New items 2001, 2003, 2052, 2070, 2074, 2129, 2133, 2154, 2450, 2479, 2568) should be controlled in accordance with paragraph 3(d) of COCOM Document No. 470, pending further consideration. In authorizing such exports, countries would ensure so far as possible that they would not be prejudicial to achieving the security objectives. Before that date there should be no exports of these items except under unusual circumstances after prior consultation with the committee.

(b) The items coming from the old quantitative control list (Items 2002, 2050, 2265, 2270, 2580, 2601, 2635, 2671, 2764) should keep the quotas previously set for 1954 until the committee should be in a position to allocate new ones. In authorizing exports, however, member governments should have regard to the substantial narrowing of coverage in the new definitions of items 2050, 2270 and 2580.

Surveillance

The consultative group instructs the Co-ordinating Committee to review the existing list III procedures as soon as possible after the recess and to report for approval at the next consultative group meeting any recommendations for improved surveillance techniques.

Meantime, member governments should ensure that they maintain adequate means of accurate and prompt reports of exports of items on the new list III, in order that the committee may, if necessary, reach quick decisions, with prompt implementation of such decisions, on the desirable level of future exports.

The consultative group further instructs the Co-ordinating Committee to study the question of what procedures should be instituted or retained to minimize transshipment to Communist China and North Korea of items to be removed from the international lists.

6. Far East

It was agreed that a review of questions of strategic controls on exports to Communist China and North Korea would be premature at this date. Accordingly with Japanese and Portuguese agreement, the question has been postponed for consideration at a later date, tentatively October.

General statements and specific comment of significance made by various delegations during the course of the meeting together with the minutes will go forward by air bag. Ends.

SALE OF SHIPS TO THE SOVIET BLOC

Following for Wilgress from Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: We would like to have your and Scully's reaction (without discussing this with any other Delegations) as soon as possible to the following outline of our present thinking:

1. It now seems clear that in the most unlikely event that the Danes come round to accepting a 550,000 ton hard ceiling without national quotas or a 450,000 ton hard ceiling with national quotas for a three-year period, they would do so only if their wishes regarding the upper speed limit of 16 knots are met and if the quota figure applies only to COCOM deliveries. This means, in effect, that the Consultative Group will be faced with a choice at its meeting on September 7 of either giving way to the Danes on the speed question and setting an even higher global quota, or else leaving matters as they now stand, which is to say, letting creeping anarchy continue to make its way into the field of shipping controls. Knowing that the Danes do not intend to abide by the unanimity rule entirely, and having in mind the large number of recent sales justified on highly questionable 3(d) grounds, we would find the second alternative about as unsatisfactory as the first.

2. When we said in telegram No. 481 of July 16 that we would accept the latest United Kingdom proposals involving a 200,000 ton annual COCOM quota if all other P.C.'s did the same, we meant of course that we would not wish Canada to wreck the scheme by being the only country in opposition. As you will have gathered, however, to have had to accept it on those terms would have been very painful to us. Notwithstanding our preparedness at that time to make such a sacrifice of security considerations for the sake of unanimity in COCOM, we have been driven by the latest reports on the Danish position to do some serious thinking about whether it would really be worth while to give way that much after all.

3. As you may know, we expressed the view in telegram No. 303 of June 21 to the Embassy that unless some agreement on shipping controls were reached quickly, we would risk ending up with no quantitative controls at all. We feared this because of our traditional belief that as all ships have strategic importance to some extent in time of war they should not be sold freely to the Soviet Bloc. However, it has been just as much a part of our thinking all along to hold that whatever controls COCOM applies must be worth while and that the protection they give the West must be the justification for the self-denial of the ship-builders. (Obviously the higher a quota is set, the less is our protection and the less is the value of the remaining controls). We have had no intention of ever drifting into a situation in which a compromise was reached involving fairly generous scales of ship sales by European countries and continued strict and irksome controls for Canadian (and United States) builders.

4. Our willingness over the past years to hold back our own builders has, therefore, been conditional upon other Participating Countries playing the game and not taking advantage of us. We have never lost sight of the fact that the security of European countries would be hazarded by excessive ship sales to an extent far greater than our own would be. We have accordingly been reluctant to appear more conscientious than countries like Denmark, Norway and the Netherlands in our zeal for safeguarding the West's security. Indeed, we are beginning to weary of our efforts over the past six months to keep this whole problem in its proper perspective in COCOM discussions. We are growing disheartened at the way some of the smaller and closer neighbours of the Soviet Bloc seem determined to have their way over unlimited ship sales.

5. In these circumstances, we are beginning to wonder whether we might not just as well adopt a Pontius Pilate attitude and give up the struggle next September 7 either by letting the Danes wreck all hopes of reaching a worth while agreement on quantitative controls or else by tipping over the apple-cart ourselves by a demonstration of equal stubbornness in the opposite direction.

6. What would be your views on a suggestion that we tell COCOM that in the Canadian view any quote arrangement which does not encompass all Soviet acquisitions and does not limit speeds to 15 knots would represent control in form but not in substance. Even without national allocations, a global quota which exceeded 150,000 tons per year would be pointless and merely a source of embarrassment without any security advantage. While we would not anticipate Soviet orders being filled in Canadian yards, we could not accept a demand to continue controls on our ship builders in these circumstances.

7. Unless you see any serious objections to the foregoing, it is what we will probably recommend to Cabinet for the sake of either

(a) preserving the minimum security safeguards that would be worth while in the light of the friction bound to be generated between competing P.C's and the burden of administering controls or, if that fails

(b) gaining freedom for Canadian ship-builders to accept Soviet orders as freely as other P.C's, thus eliminating a source of embarrassment to us. Ends.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 182-54

Ottawa, August 31, 1954

SALE OF SHIPS TO THE SOVIET BLOC

For several years past Canada, together with her NATO partners, West Germany and Japan, has exercised controls limiting the sale of merchant ships to the Soviet Bloc. The representatives of these countries meet in Paris and that group is commonly known by the initials of the Consultative Group's Coordinating Committee (COCOM).

During the past year, however, pressures have been building up in many of these countries for relaxations of those controls, partly because they have come to regard ships as having less strategic importance than formerly, and partly because of domestic, political and economic factors such as growing unemployment in their shipyards.

The pressures which have been built up reflect Soviet enquiries which are not always bona fide offers of business. However, in Canada there have been discussions with the ship-builders and more recently enquiries for existing ships in the form of about twenty Park steamships (7,155 G.R.T.) with the result that now Canadian ship-owners as well as ship-builders have been led to believe that there may be lucrative business in prospect. Colour has been lent to this belief by reports over the past year of sales of ships to the Soviet Bloc by other countries. There may be more than a coincidence in this new development occurring shortly before the next meeting of the Consultative Group to discuss shipping (scheduled for September 7).

Many efforts have been made recently by COCOM to devise some satisfactory way of bringing up to date the controls on ship sales that were in force from 1950 onwards, and allowing for increased sales to the Soviet Bloc, while at the same time preserving the essential safeguards for the security of the West.

So far no agreement has been reached on any new quota control system, and the need for a solution to this problem is becoming increasingly acute because COCOM countries are committing themselves to future deliveries of ships to be counted against their shares of some future quotas which have not yet been established.

Throughout the long course of the debates in the Paris Group on this difficult subject, the Canadian delegate has taken the position that, if any form of quantitative controls were to be kept in force (and we favoured these in principle) they should be set at levels sufficiently low to ensure that their effects in terms of security protection for the West were in themselves ample justification for the sacrifices the ship-builders in the COCOM countries were called upon to make in refusing Soviet Bloc orders.

At present the situation is this. The United Kingdom has proposed a system of controls which would provide for sales of non-embargoed types of merchant ships to the Soviet Bloc from COCOM countries aggregating not more than 200,000 gross registered tons per year. Denmark has refused to accept any such controls unless provisions are made for exceptions above that level, and the embargo speed limit is raised to 16 knots from the present limit of 12 knots fully loaded (about 14 knots in most favourable conditions). The majority favour some sort of compromise but the Danes have been inflexible in their opposition to continued controls for over four months, and show no signs of giving way.

Because of the importance of this problem, a special meeting of the Consultative Group will be held in Paris on September 7 to attempt to reach some form of agreement at long last. It is, therefore, necessary for the Canadian position to be clarified, and to this end I now wish to recommend that the Canadian delegate (Mr. Wilgress) be instructed along the following lines:

Any quota arrangement for non-embargoed types of ships which would allow the Soviet Bloc to acquire more than 150,000 G.R.T. of shipping each year from all sources (including new construction with the Bloc itself and sales by non-COCOM countries) would represent controls in form but not in substance. Consequently, if the Consultative Group were to establish a new control system based on a higher annual rate of acquisition of ships by the Soviet Bloc than the 150,000 ton figure mentioned above the Canadian Government would be unlikely to agree to continue enforcing controls on her ship-builders and ship-owners in respect of non-embargoed types of vessels, and would probably wish to reserve the right to permit sales of ships to the Bloc in those circumstances (although there may be some doubt whether any firm Soviet orders for ships will actually be placed in Canada) on the grounds that such high levels of control would be pointless and would merely embarrass the Paris Group without offering any commensurate security advantages.²⁶

CONSULTATIVE GROUP MEETING ON SEPTEMBER 7

Following for Wilgress, Begins: Yesterday (Sept. 1) Cabinet approved a recommendation on the subject of ship sales to the Soviet Bloc that you be instructed along the following lines:

"Any quota arrangement for non-embargoed types of ships which would allow the Soviet Bloc to acquire more than 150,000 G.R.T. of shipping each year from all sources (including new construction with the Bloc itself and sales by non-COCOM countries) would represent controls in form but not in substance. Consequently, if the Consultative Group were to establish a new control system based on a higher annual rate of acquisition of ships by the Soviet Bloc than the 150,000 ton figure mentioned above the Canadian Government would be unlikely to agree to continue enforcing controls on her ship-builders and ship-owners in respect of non-embargoed types of vessels, and would probably wish to reserve the right to permit sales of ships to the Bloc in those circumstances (although there may be some doubt whether any firm Soviet orders for ships will actually be placed in Canada) on the grounds that such high levels of control would be pointless and would merely embarrass the Paris Group without offering any commensurate security advantages."

2. The essential point is that we are not at this time prepared to accept any new control system going beyond the foregoing. We realize the chances of our views being accommodated by COCOM is about NIL, and so you should take the line that while we have no intention or desire to frustrate whatever hopes may exist for agreement by opposing whatever new plan may be acceptable to the majority of COCOM, we nevertheless could not undertake to bind ourselves to respect it if it were to go beyond the limits set out in my paragraph 1. In short, you should do nothing to enforce continuation of the discredited pre-1954 system by using the veto power of a contrary vote, but you should simply abstain from voting. We are unwilling to share the collective responsibility for any nugatory system wherein the West's self-denying sacrifices are not clearly justified by security advantages sincerely desired by all our COCOM partners and especially by those who are the closest neighbours of the USSR.

3. We leave it to your discretion, of course, just how to make use of the instructions approved by Cabinet which are perhaps too blunt for COCOM records in their present form. We would expect you to delay intervening in the discussions as long as possible to gain time to see how matters are developing. We believe, however, that the United States and United Kingdom are willing to accept a figure as high as 200,000 G.R.T. annually for COCOM alone.

4. Canadian officials will meet with United States officials (who do not yet know that you are going to take a firm line) in Washington tomorrow and we will let you know if any new developments of importance occur which might influence the instructions in this telegram. Ends.

CONSULTATIVE GROUP MEETING — SHIPPING CONTROLS

Following is report of Canadian delegation on discussion with Americans, Begins: Principal concern of United States over new Canadian position is that this might make it impossible under a strict legalistic interpretation of unanimity rule to arrive at agreement on any basis involving supply of over one hundred and fifty thousand tons per annum to Soviet bloc.

2. This concern was accentuated by their expectations that Danes will continue their previous reservations. We expressed some skepticism and indicated that we did not altogether share their misgivings.

3. United States concern was to a large extent off-set by our sympathetic initial reaction to proposed new formula they had in mind for use in event that it is impossible to arrive at agreement on a global quota.

4. In fact, they do not believe that an agreement can be reached even at the level of a two hundred thousand ton annual global quota. Nevertheless they will press for a global quota but if this endeavour fails they then intend to enter a substitute proposal giving any country the right to export thirty-five thousand tons per annum, with a reservation involving automatic review if the total of national tonnages threatens to exceed six hundred thousand tons over a period of three years. Provisions parallel to those recently under discussion would cover repairs and old vessels.

Most probably a version of the previous document.

5. This new proposal would appear to obviate our difficulties with discrimination against Canadian sales of ships since it would reserve to Canada the right to export up to 35,000 tons per annum.

6. The Americans expressed the strong hope that we would support them vigorously in holding the line at an upper speed limit of fifteen knots for non-embargoed ships.

7. We were also informed that the British might raise the question of the non-removal of types of radar considered by them to be harmless. We agreed to support any move by the Americans to refer this subject to technical experts. Ends.

CONSULTATIVE GROUP MEETING — SHIPPING CONTROLS

If the United States propose a new formula for control over non-embargoed types of vessels limiting COCOM countries to deliveries of shipping to the Soviet bloc not exceeding 35,000 G.R.T. per annum per country, and if the Danes and a majority of the others appear to favour it, you may indicate that while such a scheme would not limit Soviet acquisitions to the low annual rates which are desirable from the viewpoint of Western security, we would nevertheless be prepared to recommend the United States plan to Cabinet for favourable consideration. For your information we would do this on the grounds that (a) COCOM feels some control should be continued for its political and psychological value, (b) Canada would be in no worse a position than her COCOM partners and (c) we would not expect any firm Soviet orders to develop in Canada anyway.

C.G. MEETING — SHIPPING CONTROLS

The Consultative Group discussions have resulted in the following proposals forwarded in today's air bag but quoted in full owing to the importance and urgency involved. Governments must indicate whether or not the proposals are acceptable by September 20 at which time the Coordinating Committee will meet to decide whether or not a further CG meeting must be convened.

With reference to the proposals for quantitative control, it is interesting to note that the Working Group meeting on the afternoon of September 8 was completely unsuccessful in achieving realistic results and in fact ended up with a total quota requirement of over one million tons for the three year period. It was after this report was presented to the CG that we made our statement following your instructions contained in your telegram 596. This served to encourage the Chairman to reiterate that the group was meeting to discuss controls in relation to western security not the market potential of the Soviet Bloc. Finally, the United Kingdom brought forward the suggestions contained in the two annexes on the following day and after a full day's discussion, these were finally approved by the Consultative Group for reference to member governments with replies scheduled to be heard September 20.

While the ceiling tonnage figure exceeds 450,000 tons the proposed quantitative control scheme is not too incompatible with our views and contains provisions reference paragraph 5 Annex B whereby any member country may request a general review of the situation if it considers strategic, economic or political factors warrant it.

*Annex A to C.G. Paper XIV, Consultative Group Control of Vessels; Embargo Speed Provisions
9th September, 1954*

1. The Consultative Group agreed to embargo the following:

"Ships capable of more than 15.5 knots when in calm water with clean bottom under the most favourable conditions of load at maximum power.

(Note: For practical purposes, this should be considered equivalent to about 14 knots fully loaded.)"

2. In recognition of the special circumstances confronting the Danish shipbuilding industry and the Danish economy, the Consultative Group agreed that Denmark might, when this seemed necessary to safeguard Denmark's vital economic interests, undertake to deliver to the Soviet Bloc in any calendar year, out of its permissible 35,000 gross registered tons, up to 15,000 GRT of merchant shipping capable of speeds above those specified in paragraph 1 above. This 15,000 GRT is not cumulative from year to year.

3. Denmark for its part, undertook to make as little use of this special privilege as the protection of Denmark's vital economic interests required. Denmark further undertook to notify the Coordinating Committee promptly of the special circumstances leading Denmark to avail itself of this privilege in any particular instance. Where the speeds are not more than 2 knots above those in paragraph 1, such notification would be given promptly after execution of the contracts. Where the speeds are more than 2 knots above those in paragraph 1, such notification would be given in advance for prior consultation.

4. It was understood by the Consultative Group that the above-described exception from the embargo speed provisions was accorded to Denmark because of the special circumstances brought to the attention of the group by the Danish Government; and would not constitute a precedent with respect to any other country or any other commodity.

*Annex B to C.G. Paper XIV, Consultative Group Scheme for Quantitative Control of List II Vessels (except fishing vessels)
9th September, 1954*

1. For the period 1954, 1955 and 1956, no participating country shall deliver list II vessels (except fishing vessels) to the Soviet Bloc at a rate higher than 35,000 GRT per annum. Any unused portion of this 35,000 tons may be carried over into succeeding years, but none may be anticipated. In other words, member governments shall hereafter avoid any future commitment involving deliveries in excess of 35,000 tons in 1954, 70,000 tons in 1954-55 and 105,000 tons over the three years 1954, 1955 and 1956. Fractional charges for ships over 20 years old and for major rebuilding overhaul, and completion work will be on a basis to be worked out in the Coordinating Committee.

2. Over the three-year period, aggregate deliveries from participating countries to the Bloc should not exceed 600,000 GRT. Therefore when deliveries appear likely to exceed this figure — i.e. when signed contracts for deliveries have reached a total of 500,000 GRT — the Coordinating Committee shall meet to consider the necessary measures in order that the 600,000 ton figure be not exceeded. Nevertheless, recognition shall be given to commitments, whether by trade agreement or signed contracts existing as of the 8th September 1954, to the extent that any country shall be permitted to honour such commitments even if it should be necessary, for this purpose, to exceed the agreed overall level of 600,000 GRT. Each country will notify the Coordinating Committee immediately and in detail of its commitments as of the 8th September 1954.

3. Quotas should be earmarked and charged only after construction or sales contracts have been signed.

4. For the purpose of maintaining a continuous record of completed and scheduled deliveries, each participating country shall submit forthwith to the Secretariat an itemised list of:

- (a) Actual deliveries completed to date since the 1st January 1954;
- (b) Deliveries contracted for and scheduled to take place before the 31st December 1956, indicating in each case the anticipated month and year of delivery;
- (c) Deliveries contracted for and scheduled to take place after the 31st December 1956, indicating in each case the anticipated month and year of delivery.

The Secretariat shall compile this data and circulate through the Coordinating Committee, by not later than the 1st November 1954, a cumulative schedule of anticipated deliveries. Thereafter governments shall promptly notify the Committee of any additional deliveries scheduled to take place prior to the 31st December 1956; and the Secretariat shall circulate revised cumulative delivery schedules not less frequently than every two months. In addition, member countries shall notify the Secretariat, for exchange of information, of deliveries expected to take place prior to the 31st December 1956, though not yet contracted.

5. Any member country may at any time request a general review of the merchant ship situation if, in that country's view, changes in the strategic or economic or political situation warrant such review.

6. In the reviews contemplated under paragraphs 2 and 5 above, attention should be directed, inter alia, to the level of known deliveries of merchant vessels to the Soviet Bloc by countries not members of the Consultative Group. Through these reviews, the Committee should also seek means to ensure that the vital interests of any country should not be jeopardized through an inequitable distribution of the global limit of 600,000 GRT.

SALE OF SHIPS TO THE SOVIET BLOC

A special meeting of the Consultative Group was held in Paris on September 8th to attempt to reach, at long last, some form of agreement respecting the control of the sale of ships to Communist countries which has been under discussion for over a year among the countries participating in the Consultative Group.

As anticipated, the meeting was unsuccessful in reaching agreement towards limiting the quantity of ships such as are not subject to embargo. The claims of exporting countries for quotas amounted in the aggregate to over one million tons over a period of three years. This amount of shipping would, in all probability, be more than the Communist Bloc would in any case be prepared to buy. In the circumstances, the Canadian delegate made a statement in accordance with the memorandum approved by Cabinet on September 1st in general terms as follows:

Any quota arrangement for non-embargoed types of ships which would allow the Soviet Bloc to acquire more than 150,000 G.R.T. of shipping each year from all sources (including new construction with the Bloc itself and sales by non-COCOM countries) would represent controls in form but not in substance. Consequently, if the Consultative Group were to establish a new control system based on a higher annual rate of acquisition of ships by the Soviet Bloc than the 150,000 ton figure mentioned above the Canadian Government would be unlikely to agree to continue enforcing controls on her ship-builders and ship-owners in respect of non-embargoed types of vessels, and would probably wish to reserve the right to permit sales of ships to the Bloc in those circumstances (although there may be some doubt whether any firm Soviet orders for ships will actually be placed in Canada) on the grounds that such high levels of control would be pointless and would merely embarrass the Paris Group without offering any commensurate security advantages.

Following this statement the United Kingdom put forth new proposals which are given in detail in appendices "A" and "B" attached.† The first United Kingdom proposal deals with speed and provides an exception for Denmark from the agreement already reached which places all ships capable of more than 15.5 knots under embargo.

In recognition of the special circumstances confronting the Danish shipbuilding industry and the Danish economy, the Consultative Group would agree that Denmark might, when this seemed necessary to safeguard Denmark's vital economic interests, undertake to deliver to the Soviet Bloc in any calendar year, out of its permissible 35,000 gross registered tons, up to 15,000 GRT of merchant shipping capable of speeds above those specified. This 15,000 GRT is not cumulative from year to year. Denmark undertook to make as little use of the privilege as their vital economic interests permitted and to notify the COCOM whenever advantage is taken of the privilege.

The second United Kingdom proposal comprises a scheme for the quantitative control of vessels other than fishing vessels not already subject to embargo. In effect, it provides that any COCOM country may ship up to 35,000 GRT per annum for each of the next three years. Any part of the quota not used in the first year may be carried into the second or not used in the first and second years may be carried into the third. Whenever contracts for deliveries by all COCOM countries in the three years have reached the total of 500,000 GRT, the Coordinating Committee shall meet to consider measures to prevent a 600,000 GRT figure from being exceeded. Contracts entered into before the 8th of September of this year may be honoured even though the 600,000 GRT overall quota would in consequence be exceeded.

The United Kingdom proposals have been accepted by the Consultative Group for reference to Governments with replies scheduled to be heard September 20th, 1954.

The quotas proposed, exceed the 150,000 GRT per annum which, in the Canadian view, is the largest amount that could be permitted if control is to be effective from a security standpoint. The proposals would, however, impose no greater restrictions on Canada than apply to any other COCOM country disregarding the exception permitted Denmark respecting speed. The existing controls have, in practice, had the result that the European participants could claim the right to export some ships while Canada and the United States were denied that right. Under the United Kingdom proposal Canada would be given the quota of 35,000 GRT per annum exactly as any other participant. There remains however a contingent possibility that if the other COCOM countries were quickly to enter into contracts amounting to 500,000 GRT (before Canada had made use of its quota) there might be pressure within the Consultative Group to restrict further sales which could put Canada in an embarrassing situation. In this event Canada would have an opportunity to express further views. In the circumstances, it is recommended that the Canadian delegate be instructed that he need not maintain a Canadian reservation on these proposals and can accept for Canada if they commend themselves to all other participating countries.²⁹

At yesterday's meeting the United Kingdom delegation requested postponement of the meeting scheduled for September 21 on the grounds that their government is not yet in a position to comment on the contents of Annexes A and B. At their request, the meeting was postponed until next week.

In a private conversation he intimated to me that at the ministerial level there was concern over the possible discriminatory factors which under certain circumstances would be prejudicial to the United Kingdom shipbuilding industry. I believe this centers around the substantial Netherlands prior commitments of approximately 100,000 tons which, during the course of the shipping controls discussions, the Netherlands authorities have secured on the basis of trade agreements and talks with the Soviet bloc while during the same interval, the United Kingdom either has not or could not achieve comparable contracts.

The United Kingdom are quite jealous of their leadership in the shipbuilding capacity of Europe and in any discussion of national quotas prior to Annex B have consistently claimed the largest quota. At this juncture, it would be extremely unfortunate if the fact that the Netherlands hold a preponderance of firm contracts in the form of prior commitments will create antipathy in the United Kingdom towards the proposal as it now stands based on their original suggestion.

Finally, I confirm your understanding that all prior commitments now existing, as of September 8th, will be the first charges against the national quotas.

[Ottawa], December 1, 1954

Dear Mr. Howe:

I think I should let you know that we have been approached at the official level by the United Kingdom Trade Commissioner here to enquire if Canada would support a new proposal to be put forward by the United Kingdom in COCOM dealing with the strategic control over the sale of ships.

Mr. Thorneycroft has been in personal correspondence with Mr. Stassen in an endeavour to obtain American support for new United Kingdom proposals. We believe Mr. Stassen's response was cool. It is likely that Mr. Thorneycroft will find an opportunity to discuss this question with you.

Previously, COCOM had agreed upon the embargo of certain types of ships including all warships, tankers and dry cargo vessels of over 15 1/2 knots. It also had before it a United Kingdom proposal concerning quota treatment of other types.

In effect, this United Kingdom proposal provided that any COCOM country might supply up to 35,000 tons per annum for the next three years. If and when contracts for all COCOM countries reached a total of 500,000 tons for the three years, COCOM would meet to consider measures as to prevent a final hard ceiling of 600,000 tons from being exceeded. This proposal was accepted for reference to governments.

Cabinet accepted this proposal provided that all other COCOM countries also were to accept it. At the request of the United Kingdom, however, the COCOM meeting scheduled to hear the views of governments on the proposal has been postponed. The United Kingdom Government now believe that their public opinion would not accept this arrangement because that country, as one of the world's largest shipbuilders, would be at a disadvantage as compared to other potential suppliers who would exploit the situation.

The United Kingdom now wish to withdraw this proposal of theirs and propose instead that the sale of ships should be governed by what is known as "Exceptions Procedure". Under this, each participating country merely has to demonstrate that a quid pro quo exists in order to justify its sale to the Soviet bloc of any of those types of ships which are not subject to embargo. In theory, this quid pro quo should be something vital to the economy of the exporting country. In practice, however, this turns out to be a very flexible arrangement. It is wide open to abuse. Some countries have even advanced the reason that sales are advantageous because of their dollar shortage. Furthermore, it leaves the way open for the Soviet bloc to insist on including ships in its bilateral trade agreements with certain Western countries. The criteria which are used make it difficult for Canada to qualify, herself, and yet they leave no grounds for our objection to some sales by other COCOM countries.

We have informed the United Kingdom Trade Commissioner here that we believe this new proposal would only embarrass us without serving any purpose because it would not confine Soviet acquisitions of shipping within realistic limits. Any control which would allow the Soviet bloc to acquire more than 150,000 tons a year would represent control in form but not in substance.

We have suggested that in view of the serious consequences which a continued impasse on the shipping question might have for the future of COCOM, we might have to be content to recognize that it is not possible to reach agreement on effective quota restrictions.

We do not propose, ourselves, to advance any suggestions in COCOM but we think we should be prepared to accept that any Member might sell these non-embargoed types of vessels, at its own discretion, but reporting any sales to COCOM.

Admittedly, this is making the best of a bad job but we feel it is preferable to lending our support to an unworkable and ineffective scheme which will only lead to embarrassments.

Yours sincerely,

WM. FREDERICK BULL

The substance of the United Kingdom proposals is of such importance that we do not want to be rushed in our study of their implications. RELATIONS WITH THE U.S.S.R.: A RE-ASSESSMENT³⁰I. Introduction

A re-examination of our relations with the U.S.S.R. is a task which should be undertaken periodically. To my knowledge it has not been done for some time and as a result we tend to accept more or less automatically some of the basic premises with which our J.I.C., NATO and other papers now seem to start. A re-assessment

³⁰ Une version précédente de cette étude a été diffusée dans tout le ministère des Affaires extérieures à des fins de commentaires en juillet 1954.

An earlier draft of this study was circulated through the Department of External Affairs for comments in July 1954.

at the present time is particularly important because of a number of developments which are changing the political and strategic picture.

2. The first is the death of Stalin and the events inside the U.S.S.R. The removal of the man who completely dominated Soviet policy for almost thirty years is bound to have an effect on the internal and external affairs of his country. And the economic and political events since then inside the U.S.S.R. justify the view that the advent of the new leaders has made the situation much more fluid than previously.

3. The progress made by the U.S.S.R. in nuclear weapons means that the superiority previously held by the West in this field is rapidly disappearing. The U.S.S.R. also has developed the long-range bombers capable of delivering hydrogen and atomic bombs, and may be in the process of producing atomic tactical weapons. Equality, or near equality, in the fields of mass destruction weapons is therefore within sight.

4. In this connection the information concerning the extent of destruction caused by megaton weapons, which became available to the Russians in the summer of 1953, and the realisation that either side is, or shortly will be, in a position with a few bombs and a few planes to destroy vast areas of the other country, undoubtedly is a factor which the Russians, as well as ourselves, must be taking into serious consideration.

5. Finally we must admit that to all practical purposes we have reached a complete impasse in our relations with the U.S.S.R. We are not prepared to compromise on any of our basic positions and the Russians have made it clear that they will not cede any ground they consider essential to them. Any impasse requires a pause and an attempt to find out how it can be over-come.

6. This study proceeds on the assumption that the conclusion that there is no way to solve this impasse save by an eventual recourse to arms is unwarranted. It attempts to buttress this assumption by facts and arguments, and then examines the nature of the alternative solution, living with the Russians on a more or less peaceful basis.

7. Many of the arguments and conclusions are controversial. While I believe they are soundly based I am not dogmatic about them. They are advanced with the hope of stimulating discussion.

II. Soviet Foreign Policy from 1945 to Stalin's Death

8. It is hardly profitable to re-examine in too great detail the course of Soviet relations with the West from the Yalta and Potsdam Conferences up to the death of Stalin. There is little doubt that the Soviet authorities never accepted in good faith the wartime alliance. The latter was for them a very necessary and useful expedient, but Stalin saw from the beginning that there were too many differences between the two systems for them to work together after the war if Soviet aims in Europe were to be pressed.

9. Though the Soviet leaders may therefore use the argument for propaganda purposes that the West betrayed the U.S.S.R. by reneging on the terms of Potsdam and Yalta, particularly with regard to the question of an implied division of Central and Eastern Europe into spheres of interest, the Soviet leaders themselves are probably well aware of the facts.

10. Implicit in the manner by which the U.S.S.R. decided to play its cards after the war were many very great risks. Given the Soviet interpretation of the world situation at the war's end, however, they may not have seemed so great. In particular, it must have appeared to Moscow that there was no serious alternative.

11. The first important division of opinion came over the nature of the governments in the Eastern European countries, occupied by or directly under the influence of the U.S.S.R. Every major attack on Russia in the past had come from advanced bases held by aggressor countries in Eastern Europe. It was now possible for the first time in history for a Russian Government to assure itself of régimes in these countries sympathetic to Moscow. The Western Governments had, according to Soviet thinking, no direct political or economic interests in Eastern Europe, and were, furthermore, not in military occupation or in any position to enforce their views. It was also an opportunity which might never be repeated to extend the direct political control of the U.S.S.R. and the area of Communism.

12. None of this, according to Soviet thinking, could have been achieved without establishing out and out Communist régimes in the countries of Eastern Europe. If this had to be done at the risk of the Western alliance, then Moscow probably calculated that it was worth it, particularly as they could scarcely have believed that the revulsion of feeling in the West was going to be so strong. Since the Soviet leaders did not consider countries like Poland, Bulgaria and Roumania could be of prime importance to the United States, they undoubtedly then argued that their calculations were right in assuming that it was essential and not too risky to drive all Western influence out of the Balkans.

13. From this it was an easy step to attempt further easy expansion in Iran and Greece, areas of strategic importance to the Russians and ones in which they clearly thought they might be able to get away with quick and determined action. In Greece events soon reached a point where it was difficult for the Russians to withdraw support without losing face; and they only did so when the Yugoslav defection made it clearly unprofitable to continue the Civil War. In Iran, they withdrew because they were probably not yet ready for a show-down when confronted not only by united Allied opposition, but by a critical reaction from nearly all the outside world.

14. The Soviet authorities were surprised and, possibly for the first time, a little frightened by the U.S. reaction — the proclamation of the Truman doctrine, the introduction of Marshall aid, and the refusal to accept Soviet style peace treaties for Germany and Austria. The first brought direct U.S. influence to the gates of the Soviet Balkan territory. The second promised to end the hope of Communist régimes in Western Europe. And the third meant uncertainty in Central Europe and the unwelcome continuation of U.S. military interest in Europe.

15. George Kennan has argued that the Soviet reaction to this — the Czech coup d'état and the Berlin blockade — was primarily defensive. The Czech internal situation had been ripe for a Communist coup for at least six months before it took place. But the Russians only put it into action when they felt they were losing the initiative in Europe. They could not tolerate "enemy" pockets in Eastern Europe in these circumstances and so tried to tidy up the situation in Czechoslovakia and Berlin.

16. Mr. Kennan goes on to claim that there was nothing aggressive intended by the Soviet Government in these actions and that they were therefore astounded and puzzled that the Western reaction should have taken the form of military preparation for an alleged military threat, particularly since this involved the West diverting resources from the economic aid programme which up to then had proved so singularly successful. Since, he claims, Moscow had never considered attempting to expand the area of Communism by warlike means, it therefore concluded that the Western moves had some particularly sinister connotation, — the first step in the preparation of a military alliance aimed at destroying the U.S.S.R.

17. From this basic failure to understand motives behind actions on either side, other events have led on to increase mutual suspicion, particularly the success of the Communists in China, the Korean War, and the failure to reach any kind of agreement over Germany and Austria.

III. The Re-examination of Foreign Policy in Moscow After the Death of Stalin

18. It seems clear that one of the first problems tackled by the Soviet Government after the death of the vozhd was a reexamination of Soviet foreign policy. Molotov went back immediately to direct administration of the Foreign Ministry and a large number of personnel changes were made. The violent anti-American campaign was dropped and an attempt was made to behave towards the West in a slightly more civilized manner, and in a way to end the self-imposed diplomatic isolation from the rest of the world.

19. There was a very definite jettisoning of many of Stalin's policies in internal affairs and this must have had an effect on foreign policy. If, in fact, the main aides of Stalin had apparently been opposed for so long to so much of his internal programme, it is not illogical to speculate that they also disagreed with many features of his foreign policy.

20. The aspects of this policy which must have aroused opposition in the Kremlin were probably those which had created the more obviously undesirable reactions in the United States. The basic Soviet assumption of 1945 concerning Eastern Europe could hardly have been questioned. But its application subsequently in a way that, in retrospect, could scarcely have failed to antagonize and alarm the West, must have been the object of criticism. In particular, the Greek civil war, the creation of the Cominform, the Berlin blockade and the Czech coup d'état were gambles much too risky if the Soviet Union had hoped for an extension of Communism in Europe without war.

21. Stalin admitted (in the published correspondence with the Yugoslav Communist Party prior to the June, 1948, split) that a Communist revolution was not within the bounds of possibility in France and Italy because the Red Army was not in a position to intervene physically. In other words, he did not conceive of the establishment of Communist régimes in those countries at an early date. The Czech coup d'état and the Berlin blockade do not seem to have been planned as steps towards a further expansion of Soviet power in Europe, and we can conclude therefore that they were primarily defensive and intended to tidy up a potentially dangerous situation for the Soviet position in Eastern Europe.

22. Nevertheless, many Russians must have questioned the wisdom of actions, two of which failed, which had relatively minor aims, but which had the end effect of postponing indefinitely the chance of further Soviet expansion in Europe. More important, they resulted in alerting the West, and particularly the United States, to the true nature of the Soviet régime, and the creation of an alliance which constituted a real military threat to the U.S.S.R.

23. Two other events in Europe constituted an important set-back to the Soviet Union — the serious miscalculations leading to the break with Tito, and the postponement of the U.S. economic depression, which was such an important factor in Soviet calculations. That the former is now considered a mistake can be seen from the post-Stalin attempts to restore more or less normal diplomatic relations with Yugoslavia, though things had clearly gone too far for the Russians to back down completely.

24. Again, as regards the failure of the United States to follow the expected pattern, produce an economic crisis and, beset by its own internal difficulties, withdraw within itself, there must have been much soul-searching in Moscow. The disgrace of Varga for predicting that the nature of capitalism had so changed that a depression was not inevitable, was at least partly corrected last fall. But that does not necessarily mean that the Soviet leaders admit that they were wrong. The depression was postponed, they argued, by the adoption of such measures as widespread economic assistance to other weaker capitalist governments, and then the creation of an alleged war threat to justify re-armament — in Marxist terms, traditional methods. But it must be added that in Soviet long-run thinking the armament burden is certainly considered as acerbating the crisis of capitalism.

25. The Russians also miscalculated about the strength of the Communist parties in Western Europe (and this resulted in a number of tactical blunders, such as the withdrawal of the Communists in coalition governments in France and Italy, the call to strike and so on); about the relative strength of the capitalist and communist economies; and about the ability of erstwhile capitalist enemies to work together.

26. Another miscalculation which, however, in the end led to the biggest single Soviet gain since the war, was the failure to recognize the strength of Chinese Communism. Stalin apparently calculated that Mao Tse-tung would only be able to control a part of China and there made his plans on that basis. Some United States experts in Far Eastern affairs argue that the Soviet Government would have preferred a divided China. The Russians knew that Nationalist China was sufficiently corrupt and inefficient that it would eventually fall into Communist hands; but in the post-war years, they were too preoccupied with European and internal problems to wish to extend rapidly the area of Communism in Asia. It is also suggested that Stalin would have preferred a divided China so that he could more completely control the Communist half.

27. But the complete victory of Mao in China without involving the U.S.S.R. immediately in major disputes with the capitalist powers, though a surprise, must on the whole have been a satisfying one, and it was possibly this over-confidence which led to the greatest miscalculation. The attack on Korea was undoubtedly intended to take advantage of a local situation. From Moscow the advantages to be gained from the expulsion of the last remnants of a non-Soviet régime from the North Asian mainland far out-weighed what must have appeared to be the minor risks involved.

28. The fact that the gamble was considered a mistake after U.S. intervention can be seen from the early action taken by the Malenkov Government to end the hostilities in the Spring of 1953. Before that Stalin had probably stubbornly refused to admit he was wrong and therefore prolonged the armistice negotiations for almost two years.

29. To sum up, Soviet actions since the death of Stalin indicate that there had been considerable doubt in the leadership about the advisability of many of the tactics of Soviet foreign policy since 1945, though this probably did not include the basic decision to consolidate their position in Eastern Europe even at the expense of the wartime alliance. It seems likely that the Soviet leaders did not contemplate recourse to war to further these policies.

30. The maintenance after the end of hostilities of what seemed to the West alarmingly large forces was considered necessary by the Russians because first, it would have been dangerous for them internally to demobilize very quickly; second, the Red Army was used frequently for post-war reconstruction projects; third, the situation in Eastern Europe required fairly large forces on the spot; fourth, it is an old Russian tradition to maintain large standing armies as part of foreign policy; and fifth, they considered that a large standing army was required to offset Western superiority in air power and atomic weapons.

IV. Nuclear Weapons and Soviet Strategy

31. Inextricably involved in all aspects of Soviet strategy from 1945 to the present time is the question of the Soviet estimate of the importance of nuclear weapons in the military and political situation. In spite of the fact that the Russians publicly insisted that the Japanese surrendered because of their defeat by the Russian armies in Manchuria, there can be little doubt that they were well aware that the atom bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki were the major factors in the victory of the Allies. Since then the bomb has undoubtedly had an important place in their thinking.

32. The first Soviet reaction was probably to add another argument in favour of maintaining large standing armies to offset the United States advantage in atomic weapons. The second was to corner as many German scientists as they could and set them to work with their own workers to catch up with the Americans as quickly as possible. This meant an additional diversion of already over-strained man-power and equipment from the long neglected fields of consumer goods.

33. The traditional Russian inferiority complex towards the West was certainly increased as a result of fear of the atomic bomb, and this may well have played a certain role in Soviet reactions to Western moves. The progress they made in developing the bomb, and presumably stock-piling them, must gradually have increased their feeling of confidence until the United States explosion of the hydrogen bomb, and their own explosion in August, 1953, led to the realisation that each side had under its control a weapon of such vast destructive power that all previous ideas on warfare might have to be revised.

34. It is impossible to tell what role this information has played in shaping Soviet foreign policy in the past year and a half. It could scarcely go ignored, as it has not gone ignored here. On the other hand, no Western policy has yet been modified in any important way because of this information, and, therefore, we do not need to conclude that the modifications in Soviet policy which have taken place are necessarily the result of the megaton bomb.

35. It would be unrealistic not to assume, however, that this information has helped to reinforce the trend already noticeable immediately after Stalin's death towards a policy of lowering international tension. Mutual self-destruction has certainly never been a Soviet aim. We can even speculate if this horrifying information may not have led some Soviet leaders to wonder if it did not tend to make nonsense of the whole Marxist theory of human development.

V. "Peace at No Price"

36. Since Stalin died the process of revising Soviet foreign policy has taken the shape of a fairly clear attempt to reduce international tension and to put relations with the rest of the world on a slightly more normal basis, without, at the same time, making any great sacrifice. Mr. Bohlen has called it "peace at no price".

37. The efforts made by the U.S.S.R. to reduce tension, or at least not to aggravate it further, have not in fact entailed the giving up of anything substantial. On the other hand, it seems possible that in April and May, 1953, the Soviet authorities were seriously exploring ways and means of establishing more peaceful relations with the West, specifically in the two areas of greatest tension — Korea and Germany. They did succeed in stopping the fighting in the first, but this was an action which required simply the abandonment of a propaganda position which had already in any case begun to wear pretty thin.

38. It is the opinion of most Soviet experts that the Russians were contemplating at that time the possibility of an eventual withdrawal from their zone of Germany. East Germany was obviously not a very successful political experiment for the Russians and it was beginning to become an economic liability as well. The continued division of Germany and the anomalous position of Berlin presented the greatest danger of friction with the West and some Soviet sacrifice might have been worthwhile, if it could have achieved the withdrawal of allied forces from Western Germany and eventually of the United States from Europe.

39. The Russians could only have contemplated a withdrawal from Eastern Germany if it were orderly and did not involve the abandonment of a fully Sovietised régime. This may, therefore, be the explanation for the "liberalising" measures taken in May and early June in East Germany, measures intended in part to make the Pieck Government more popular, in part to prepare for de-Sovietisation. How far this could really have been carried is difficult to say. The revolt of June 17 effectively put an end to any prospect of a Soviet withdrawal since it revealed to the Russians the extent of German opposition to the Communist régime. Free elections would have meant an anti-Soviet landslide. The Marxistly impossible would have taken place; the workers in a workers' state would have rebelled against the dictatorship of the proletariat. A continuation of this process was impossible for the Russians not only because it would have endangered their position in all of Eastern Europe, but would have had a disastrous effect in practice on their prestige with the Communists throughout the non-Soviet world.

40. June 17 was the turning point and it must have convinced the Russians that no concessions in East Germany could be contemplated. When at the same time the Western powers made it clear that they had no intention of making any compromise over Germany, it was obvious that there was nothing further to be gained by discussing the problem. Our political mistake was not to accept the Soviet protestations at their face value in the Spring of 1953 and explore at the highest level the possibilities of lowering tension. At the best, we might have found the Russians in a mood to compromise. At the worst we would have caught them completely off-balance before they were sure of their position internally or externally.

41. The second look which the Soviet leaders must have given their foreign policies after the June revolt was probably made with the question of military security more immediately in view than the previous assessment. This conclusion is based not only on the lessons of June 17 but on the fact that the Soviet General Staff seems to have had a greater influence on Soviet policy since the arrest of Beria than previously. This would mean that military considerations would take primacy over political ones. At the Berlin Conference that meant in fact that the Soviet Union was not prepared to withdraw from its advanced strategic bases in Germany and Austria unless the political gains would be compensated for militarily.

42. Looked at in another way it really means that while the Soviet leaders may have accepted the premise that war was not inevitable, that a relaxation of tension was both desirable and possible, yet in practice they acted in a contrary spirit. It is this confusion in Moscow which has helped to make the pattern of Soviet diplomacy seem inconsistent and often contradictory.

VI. The Military Approach and its Dangers

43. Inevitably when the military approach starts to take precedence it becomes itself a factor in the situation. As in the West so in Moscow an increasing estimate of the danger of war eventually breaking out could hardly have failed to affect Soviet political and economic planning.

44. George Kennan has put this dilemma in very good perspective. "The Soviet apparatus of power", he wrote from Moscow in September 1952, "while free of pressures of a parliamentary system and a free press, is nevertheless not wholly immune to the operation of that law of political affairs by which military preparations attain a momentum of their own and make more likely the very thing that they are supposed — by the invariable claim of all governments — to deter and prevent. For every government, the calculations of probabilities with respect to military conflict set up something in the nature of magnetic fields, which in turn affect behaviour. To believe in the likelihood of war, whether rightly or wrongly, means in some degree to behave in a manner that will actually enhance that likelihood, insofar as it implies the neglect of alternative courses and some degree of commitment to the requirements of the course you would take if you knew definitely that war would come . . . Soviet policy, in other words, must also have been to some extent drawn into the magnetic field of belief in a relatively greater probability of war. And since what you do to be prepared for a war is very often the enemy of what you would do if you wished to avoid it, Soviet ability to pursue policies designed to avoid a future war must have suffered accordingly."

45. This does not necessarily mean that the Soviet leaders decided after careful deliberation that they must plan on the assumption that war was inevitable. They no doubt think it possible that it may come about because of action taken by the Western bloc, and this in itself would require certain actions on the part of the U.S.S.R. to prepare against this eventually. But I do not think they are planning politically on the assumption either of an aggressive war launched by Moscow, or that it will be impossible to avoid the clash with the West. On the other hand, there is no doubt that the Soviet estimate that the two blocs may stumble into war has increased since the advent to power of the Republican régime in the United States.

46. The difficulty is that the more we in the West talk about the inevitability of war with the U.S.S.R., the greater the pressure becomes in the Soviet Union to take the necessary precautions against this eventuality. They may believe they are skilful enough to avoid a war provided the other side is not dead set on it. But if both sides become convinced that the clash is inevitable, then the very weight of their convictions would help to bring on the very thing they wished to avoid, and it thus becomes a factor in itself.

VII. The Soviet Attitude Towards War

47. There are several arguments to support the contention that the Soviet leaders do not want a "hot" war, and do not believe in the inevitability of a clash between the two blocs. The "cold war" obviously suited Stalin very well. It supported the picture he painted to the Soviet people of a menacing capitalist world against which it was necessary to maintain large armies and devote the vast bulk of Soviet energies to heavy industry and armaments. It maintained a sense of urgency and justified the existence of secrecy and force in internal affairs. But at the same time it did not require that too much actual power be delegated to the generals, a situation which Stalin found fraught with potential danger in World War II. The relative rise in influence of the generals in the Party and of the General Staff in policy decisions since the death of Stalin must be looked on in many Party circles with apprehension. Its concomitant would be a reluctance for the Party forces to take decisions tending to concentrate more power in the Army at a time when the Secret Police has been demoralised and weakened.

48. The Soviet leaders probably have sufficient confidence in their ability to exploit the developing political situation, if a war can be averted. They must also still be relatively sure that in the long run they will be able to gain their principal aims without having recourse to war.

49. The internal political and economic situation in the U.S.S.R. and in the European satellites is not so good as to encourage the Soviet leaders to choose war as a solution of their problems with the West, problems which in any case they do not consider as requiring such early solutions as do we in the West who are more impatient to see a traditional form of peace restored to the world. I shall return later in more detail to the effect of the Soviet internal situation on foreign policy.

50. Finally, there is the question of the traditional Russian attitude to war and the Marxist-Leninist-Stalinist interpretation of "just" wars, both of which are of considerable importance in calculating the Soviet position.

51. Russia has never had a glorious military tradition such as most countries of continental Europe. The Tsars always kept up what seemed an inordinately large standing army and the inference was often drawn by other European powers that the Russians were contemplating aggression against their neighbours. But it was usually forgotten that Russia was an autocratic and antiquated state that by its very nature required a large standing army for internal reasons, and that it extended over a territory vastly greater than that of any other major power. The Tsars were not averse to using the fact of a large standing army to help their foreign policies but they never actually used their apparent military preponderance to launch an aggressive adventure.

52. In addition to this essentially defensive concept of the role of their armed forces, the Russians never developed any focus for a strong military tradition. In Tsarist times there was never an officer corps comparable to that of Germany or Japan, and the generals did not exercise any independent and decisive role on Russian policy.

53. If this were true in Tsarist times it is just as true to-day, though possibly for different reasons. Apart from the Bolshevik invasion of Poland during the Civil War, which was an integral part of those disordered times, the only overtly aggressive military moves by the Russians have been in the invasions of the Baltic States and Eastern Poland in September 1939, and the winter war of 1939-40 against Finland. In both cases the Soviet Government claimed they were taking purely preventive measures to deny to a potential enemy bases for an eventual attack against the U.S.S.R.

54. The German concept of an officer corps does not exist in the U.S.S.R. today though it is possible that a Soviet counterpart was being built up in the thirties before Stalin destroyed the then existing General Staff. But it is difficult to think of the present group of senior Soviet military officers as an independent force in Soviet affairs. A Soviet general considers himself primarily as a servant of the Soviet state who happens because of special qualifications to be serving it in the Army rather than as the manager of a factory, or in some other capacity. His loyalties are to the Communist Party, not to his fellow officers. There may be exceptions, of course, but this is the way the majority probably feel. And in case they don't, the Army is so riddled with spies and spies on the spies, it could never function as an independent collectivity.

55. The question of the Marxist interpretation of war is one which has perhaps been most neglected. It is nevertheless an important factor in Soviet considerations on this subject.

56. In the western world for the great majority of the people peace is the norm and war is a deviation from this ideal state which must, if at all possible, be maintained. The Marxist concept of war and peace is, however, quite different. In Marxist ideology the cause of war lies in the mere existence of capitalist society, or rather the division of society into exploiting and exploited classes. War is not an exception or contradiction to the principles of capitalism but the direct results of it. The abolition of wars can only come as the result of the destruction of capitalism. War and peace are therefore simply different phases of one single economic and political process. This in itself gives some indication why the "cold" war seems a more acceptable phenomenon to the Russians than to ourselves.

57. The communists distinguish between "unjust" wars ("wars of conquest, waged to conquer and enslave foreign countries and foreign nations") and "just" wars ("wars that are not wars of conquest but wars of liberation, waged to defend the people from foreign attack and from attempts to enslave them, or to liberate the people from capitalist slavery or, lastly, to liberate colonies and dependent countries from the yoke of imperialism").

58. This does not mean, however, that the U.S.S.R. is obliged to rush to the assistance of any foreign revolutionary movement. The conditions under which help would be extended to a communist revolt in another country have been carefully spelled out. In the first place the revolt must in itself have a good chance of succeeding and, more important, Soviet intervention must not imperil the security of the U.S.S.R. itself.

59. In fact running through all the Leninist-Stalinist writings on this subject is the theme that the primary consideration in deciding on war or peace, or indeed any major question of foreign policy, is the manner in which it is going to affect the citadel of communism, and foreign communists are constantly reminded that they will have to sacrifice their own local hopes to this major consideration, since, without the U.S.S.R., communism as a whole would be quickly eliminated.

60. Communist doctrine has also firmly advocated measures to prevent either wars between imperialist powers, or by imperialist powers against the U.S.S.R. While the former tend to weaken the capitalist world they tend to involve the Soviet Union at moments not of its own choosing. An outright attack on the U.S.S.R. is clearly something the Soviet leaders must try to avoid, but not by any concessions, particularly territorial, which would seriously weaken the Soviet position.

VIII. The Risks Inherent in Soviet Foreign Policy

61. The Soviet ideological approach does not dismiss the possibility of war, nor in all likelihood does their actual estimate of the present situation. This in itself tends to create an attitude which may make war more difficult to avoid. Yet the new Soviet leaders are eminently practical men who are presumably quite aware that a war, even if victorious, would create vastly greater problems for them than they now face. In fact it might well destroy the U.S.S.R. and the Western civilisation of which they are still proud to be part.

62. The difficulty is to reconcile this with the risks they are running in their present policy. In the first place it is almost impossible for the U.S.S.R. to make any real concessions with regard to questions where it has the sole say. The Russians are experts in the art of power politics. They are well aware of the danger of yielding, or at least appearing to yield to superior strength unless in so doing there is some obvious gain, either in increased security, or in forcing the opponent to waste his strength. The Russians will only yield to superior force if by so doing they can reduce the pressure brought to bear against them and insure themselves against being asked to make further and repeated concessions in response to the same means of pressure. They will not yield to pressure if they feel it starts them on a path to which they can see no ending.

63. Applying this reasoning to Europe it is easy to see that the Russians must have concluded that a retreat from Austria and from East Germany would not bring them a substantial relaxation of tension but would simply result in increased pressure on the more vulnerable satellites. This was made quite explicit in a number of speeches by important United States Government officials.

64. Insofar as Korea is concerned the Soviet Union risked none of these things in advocating a cease-fire and on the contrary gained some advantages. In Indo-China the situation is different as the U.S.S.R. probably is in no position to enforce its will but must take into consideration the widely varying needs of China and Viet-Minh. Nevertheless it seems likely that the Soviet Union advocated a cease-fire at least in part because the situation was getting out of hand and carried the danger of extending the conflict in a way which could not be easily controlled by Moscow.

65. In pursuing a foreign policy which carries many risks (even if that foreign policy may have been the heritage of an irascible and stubborn old man and which the present régime may not entirely have approved), the Soviet leaders can act on the basis of several assumptions which tend to minimise the danger to them. The first is the knowledge that the United States cannot act entirely alone and must to some extent take into consideration the view of its European allies. The Russians may believe that the policy of NATO is dictated by the United States and that in the last analysis Washington forces the pace. But they also know that it would be suicidal for the European allies to engage in war with the U.S.S.R. and that this must have some influence on U.S. policies.

66. They are also aware of the passionate desire throughout the world for peace. Hence the tremendous effort to present Soviet policies as peaceful in contradiction to the warmongering policies of the West. But, apart from the straight propaganda value of the peace campaign, the knowledge must be comforting to the Soviet leaders that not only would even "imperialist" governments in the last analysis hesitate to pursue their interests by war-like means, but that the sentiments of the people in the West would make the launching of war very difficult.

67. This, of course, leads to a temptation for the Russians to exploit human weaknesses on our side, and it requires on the part of the Soviet leaders a fairly skilful estimate of how far they can blackmail the West. Stalin was apparently prepared to cut it pretty close, while the Malenkov-Khrushchev team is making a greater allowance for errors.

IX. Soviet Long-term Aims and the Ideological Motivation

68. The theory of Marxism, and its additions by Lenin and Stalin, on the subject of world revolution, are too well known to bear repetition here. The Communists hope for, and confidently expect, that through the inevitable process of history the capitalist world will eventually destroy itself or be destroyed, to be replaced by a world-wide communist society. But there is a wide gap between the theory and the reality.

69. In practice, it is doubtful if even Stalin would have welcomed too rapid an expansion of the area of communism; the present leaders give every indication of being highly practical men who are even more likely to put in first place the dictates of necessity. Furthermore, their experiences in Yugoslavia and Germany have pointed up the great difficulties they face in handling alien peoples. Of course, in theory there should be no need of Russian bayonets, and in some countries, such as Czechoslovakia, this has proved true.

70. The victory of native communism in China has had an important effect on the outlook of the Soviet leaders. On the one hand, it has increased their self-confidence by destroying the pre-war feeling of isolation. On the other hand, it has weakened the supreme position of Moscow and will tend increasingly towards the setting up of two centres of authority and influence, and perhaps even of dogma, in the Soviet world.

71. But it is doubtful if a communist world as such is a Soviet aim unless the Soviet leaders are convinced that that world could continue to be controlled by Moscow. It seems to me unlikely that they could have many illusions on this score. While they have been able to control the East European satellites with fair success, even in this area where they have the advantage of proximity, and, in most cases, actual force at their disposal, they have failed dismally to control Yugoslavia, and must recognize that Eastern Germany would in all likelihood cast off communism the moment Soviet troops were withdrawn. How much confidence could they therefore really place in the subservience, or at least loyalty, to Moscow of France, Italy, Germany, not to mention the United Kingdom and North America?

72. Furthermore, one of the main instruments by which the Soviet bloc is now held together is the alleged threat to it from the capitalist world. With this removed there would be less reason for a largely communist world to leave absolute control of it to the Russians.

73. If one seriously examines Soviet aims from this standpoint, I think in the end we must in all honesty admit that the constantly reiterated long-term aim which we ascribe to the Russians is misleading. Naturally, if the world could be conquered for communism without weakening control by the U.S.S.R., that would be another matter. But the Russians, who are in any case constantly governed by an almost psychopathic feeling of inferiority vis-à-vis the Western world, can hardly have any illusions on this score.

74. I should qualify this by adding that possibly Stalin and Zhdanov may have believed this was possible, but I doubt if very many of the present leaders would welcome very great additions to the Soviet bloc, particularly of indigestible areas, at the present time. If these additions had to come by military action, I think the Soviet leaders would definitely shun it.

75. The old concept of revolution is also passing. The idea seems to be increasingly accepted in Moscow that the Russian revolution was a unique and non-recurring event. The victory of Chinese communism certainly seems entirely contrary to Marxist theory, as does the manner by which communist régimes came to power in Eastern Europe. There the role of the revolutionary has been played down and, indeed, after the communist régimes came to power, most of the idealists were quickly discarded in favour of reliable bureaucrats and party hacks who could be relied on to administer their territory faithfully in accordance with Moscow's decrees. And in making the revolution the first aim seemed to be to take over the fabric of society intact. The doctrine of destroying the old to build a bright new world is now "left-wing deviationism", and in Moscow the communist manifesto is practically a subversive document.

76. What this means in terms of Moscow's long-term aims is simply that the Soviet leaders are well aware not only of the difficulties they would be faced with in over-extending the area of communism but of the almost insuperable obstacles in rebuilding a modern society from scratch after the destruction of its social and physical base.

77. It is important to know in this context to what extent the Soviet leaders are influenced by ideology. It is also one of the most difficult questions to answer. By 1939 Marxist theory had been considerably modified in order to fit the difficulties of applying the doctrine. The war hastened the process of disillusionment by revealing such paradoxes as massive capitalist aid to the U.S.S.R., and the failure of the German working masses to desert their country in order to join with the troops of the communist fatherland. And in many cases the convulsions necessary to meet these situations were accomplished with complete cynicism by the Soviet leaders, so much so that a tightening of ideological controls was necessary after the war. But this does not necessarily mean that the leaders were not convinced of the rightness and inevitability of their ideology.

78. It is unlikely that the Russians have laid aside their Marxist spectacles in viewing foreign affairs, but a close examination of their policies since 1945 leads to some doubt as to whether any single act of territorial expansion would have been different even if the Russian Government were not Marxist. The ideology was communist but the policy was one that almost every previous Tsarist Government secretly dreamed of accomplishing.

79. But this does not mean that the attitude to the West is not motivated in a quite different way because of its Marxist content. The dynamism in the Soviet society of the last thirty-five years is a specially Russian blend. It is largely Marxist in form and yet there is an underlying Russian base. There has hardly been a generation of Russians which has not produced at least one politician or philosopher to proclaim the Messianic role of Russia. "If we have come after the others", said Chaadaiev in the early years of the 19th century, "it is to do better than the others . . . We are called to solve most of the social problems, to complete most of the ideas originated in the old societies; we are called to state our opinion on the gravest questions which absorb mankind."

80. But the specifically Marxist portion of this Russian dynamism (which, however, in the past has always proved to have tremendous ebbs and flows) is manifest in a belief in the inherently aggressive nature of capitalist society which makes it difficult to accept any state except that of armed truce. When this is combined with a genuine inferiority complex, jealousy and fear of the West and the United States in particular, and an almost complete ignorance at the top level of conditions in the outside world, the result is one hardly conducive to an unemotional and balanced approach to world problems.

81. These are practical considerations making a modus vivendi between the two camps more difficult. But while the Marxist education of the present Soviet leaders undoubtedly helps to confuse their appreciation of world problems I do not think it obscures it completely. They have given indications that their primary considerations are practical ones, and that when necessary theory will be sacrificed to the needs of the situation.

82. This was put quite clearly in a recent authoritative article in the theoretical journal of the Communist Party, Kommunist. In attacking dogmatism it said that it "leads to the elaboration of certain principles without taking into account the facts". It denounced the habit of considering "the economic laws of socialism as a fetish", and demanded that the Party activists re-interpret Marxist theories in line with the facts of life.

83. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the communist expansionism since 1945 would not have been very different without the Marxist ideology and that any powerful Russian state would have followed precisely the same aims as did Stalin. The main difference lies in the fact that the Soviet state was also served by a dynamic political philosophy and numerous and well-organized fifth columns abroad. It is, of course, this combination of physical and messianic strength which constitutes the over-powering force of the U.S.S.R. today. But it should be constantly remembered that Russia, particularly in alliance with China, could still be a menace to the rest of the world even if Marxism were to vanish completely.

X. Internal Factors Affecting Soviet Foreign Policy

84. It would be foolish to think that Soviet foreign policy could be studied without taking into consideration the important developments which are taking place inside the U.S.S.R. These are three-fold in nature — economic, social and political.

85. Soviet leaders have succeeded to a very large extent in transforming the U.S.S.R. into a major industrial nation in a relatively short time, but it is now becoming apparent that this has resulted in a completely lop-sided economic structure. The heavy industry and armaments base is firmly established but at the expense of agriculture which is in some aspects behind the pre-revolutionary period. Grain production is not even keeping up with the three million annual population increase. Light industry, housing and services to the public are quite inadequate to the needs of the population. The railway net-work is poor and out-of-date, and apart from two or three macadamised roads there are no adequate public highways to speak of. These paradoxes have been in existence for some time but it is only in the last few months that some of these defects have been acknowledged to exist. And this happened simply because it was clear that the whole structure would collapse if the food supply was not improved.

86. The U.S.S.R. is settling down into a social mould which must inevitably have some effect on its relations with the rest of the world. It is developing new upper and middle classes which owe their positions to the Revolution but which are anxious to maintain the rank, prestige, wealth and privileges which they have won, and pass them on to their children. It has produced an intelligentsia which is able and as well endowed as that in the West with the powers of speculation and original thought.

87. But the process of development in Soviet society has also created great gaps between the new privileged classes on the one hand and the urban working class and even more so the peasantry on the other. The latter still represent over half the population. They are economically and socially depressed and their loyalty to, or at least enthusiasm for, the régime is doubtful. Any society built by force on such a precarious base carries within it the possibilities of its own destruction.

88. Little if anything is being done to modify this situation, and on the contrary the gaps already existing between the social groups in the U.S.S.R. are growing. Since it is still possible for the clever worker's son to move up into a higher social bracket, Soviet society is still relatively dynamic. But this affects only a small portion of the population and the bridging of this social gulf is becoming increasingly difficult.

89. The attention devoted to the agricultural problem in the last year, and the personal attention given it by Khrushchev is an indication that it is more than an economic crisis that the régime faces. It seems to me that there is little likelihood of the Soviet leaders improving the standard of living of the peasants in the near future or being able successfully to solve the ideological or social contradictions between the city and the countryside. And this is a problem of immense size for the Soviet leadership and one which they would hardly wish to leave unsolved in order to seek foreign adventures.

90. Politically there is also a trend towards stagnation. Stalin recognised that the hierarchy was becoming petrified and at the 19th Party Congress he moved to expand the inner governing body of the Party by abolishing the Politburo and replacing it by a larger Presidium. The present leaders have returned to what amounts to a Politburo of whom the seven key members have been at or near the top for several decades. It is possible that the men who are certainly now coming forward will be able to break into this charmed circle. If they do they will bring quite a new atmosphere to Soviet politics. Already it is clear that the younger men are a different type from the old revolutionaries. They are capable administrators but they lack that personal dynamism which was present in Stalin and even to a certain extent in people like Kaganovich, Mikoyan and Khrushchev.

91. The possibilities of internal political troubles inside the U.S.S.R. cannot be entirely dismissed. A dictatorship without a dictator is an anomaly, even given the special circumstances of the Soviet Union. An internal economic crisis, or greater international tension, would create a situation demanding strong leadership of the kind the Russians have always respected in the past — that is personal leadership. This could lead to rivalries not only at the top but all through the Central Committee where there can be little doubt the members are being lined up in the various camps. Combined with this is the constant play of ideas and policies in this body the importance of which is often over-looked.

92. On the minorities front there has been a certain moderation of the tough Great Russian line, but no indication that any important political or cultural concessions are going to be made to the smaller nationalities. The fact remains, however, that almost half of the population of the U.S.S.R. is non-Russian and at the most apathetic towards their Russian masters. Since they occupy strategic areas along the western, northern, southern and south-eastern frontiers, the attitude of these races is an important factor which the Soviet leaders could not disregard in determining their foreign policy.

93. A final internal factor to be taken into consideration is the really great weariness of the Soviet people. Their collective enthusiasm is beginning to run down at a moment when their leadership is less dynamic than it was, and so far no substitute that can inspire the Russians to further tremendous personal sacrifices and outbursts of energy has been found. Apart from this there exists a genuine horror of war among the Russian people. If war broke out, the Soviet leaders might be able to convince their people that it was the result of capitalist aggression but the latter would enter it almost certainly with apathy or resignation, particularly as the enemy would be a race which traditionally has had no quarrel with the Russian people. The Soviet leaders can largely ignore their feelings but there is a limit to this, particularly since the death of Stalin. The new hierarchy is apparently in closer touch with Soviet realities than Stalin was and would hesitate to launch a war for which it felt the people were psychologically unprepared.

94. The sum of this brief survey of internal affairs is to show: (a) that the structure of Soviet society has vastly changed in the last 20 years and is settling down into a conservative mould; (b) that the leadership of the Party and the Government are also changing and that political dissensions over personalities and policies cannot be ruled out; (c) that the minorities question has not been solved; (d) that the economy of the U.S.S.R. while strong and growing stronger is nevertheless out of balance; (e) that there are many great and potentially dangerous contradictions in Soviet society, particularly in the countryside; and (f) that there is a great longing for peace and "normalcy" among the Soviet people.

95. As regards relations with the Soviet satellites, the Soviet leaders can hardly consider that they have as yet had time to consolidate their position in these territories solidly enough for the waging of war. Estimates of the successes of the political and economic programmes in the various satellites vary but are unanimous in describing the basic antagonism of the peoples to the U.S.S.R. While this does not constitute a menace to the Russians in time of peace, it would be a further factor in making the Soviet leaders hesitate in putting the bloc to the strain of war.

96. To sum up, it would be unwise not to take into consideration the various factors in the internal situation in the U.S.S.R. and the satellite bloc. We are slightly bemused by the size and monolithic character of the Soviet Empire and tend to forget that it has its weaknesses and contradictions as well, and that on the basis of the domestic situation alone the Soviet leaders would probably wish to avoid war at the present time, and indeed for the indefinite future provided the international situation did not change radically.

XI. On the Brink of the Precipice

97. Yuri Krijanitch, an extraordinary Croat priest who migrated to Russia in the early part of the 17th century and preached the doctrine of Pan-Slavism, wrote of his "adopted" country: "Our great misfortune is our lack of moderation in the exercise of power; we are unable to observe the middle way; we have no sense of measure. We go to extremes and wander on the brink of precipices".

98. It is no new thing for the Russians to run risks. In a certain way they delight in it but they have never (like the Germans) deliberately stepped off into the abyss. And I think all the evidence points to the fact that they will not do it now unless in desperation or under extreme provocation. And it seems to me most of their leaders know as well, and perhaps better than some Americans, how close to the precipice their policy has taken them. This study has tried to show why they have followed the policies they have and what in my view they are likely to want now.

99. What the Soviet leaders would probably like to arrange is a workable division of the world more or less along the present lines. Ideally for them this should mean a solution of the Berlin problem (Germany could remain divided as at present), the Austrian occupation, Korea and Indo-China. With these dangerous points of friction eliminated the Russians would no doubt be prepared to settle down for a longish period of "peaceful co-existence".

100. I do not, for the various reasons outlined above, think the Russians are particularly interested in further territorial expansion, at least for the foreseeable present, and certainly not by war-like means. But it is in the nature of the Soviet Russian state that it should exert constant pressure outwards. This pressure nevertheless is not governed by any doctrine that imposes time-tables, and above all there is none of the Germanic or Japanese feeling that there must be expansion or explosion outwards. If the counter-pressure of the outside world becomes too great it is not shameful for the Soviet leaders to take measures to reduce it by a temporary withdrawal.

101. A recent despatch from our Ambassador in Washington (No. 712)[†] stated that the assumption in United States Government circles seemed to be that peaceful co-existence was impossible. This seems to me not only an unduly pessimistic estimate but one which is positively suicidal since the only alternative will lead to the near extermination of a large portion of the civilised world, no matter whose the victory. It springs directly, no doubt, from the United States reaction to the frustrating situation in which we now find ourselves. In 1947 Frank Roberts, then Minister at the United Kingdom Embassy in Moscow, commented on George Kennan's

"containment" thesis as being excellent for the British, but impossible for the Americans. The former, he thought, would be quite ready to wait 25 years for the policy to work itself out. The Americans would insist on seeing results within five years.

102. If we assume that the Soviet leaders: (a) have no intention of giving up any of their territorial or political gains; (b) do not intend to try to extend their system any further by military means in the foreseeable future, and (c) wish to avoid an intensification of international tension, there are three conclusions to be reached of the effect of this "containment" or "peaceful co-existence" policy on the U.S.S.R. itself.

103. A long period of relative peace could lead to: (a) a mellowing of the Soviet system; (b) its disintegration; or (c) its explosion outwards. The last seems to me improbable for the reasons outlined above but it is not impossible that changed conditions could lead to Bonapartism and the ascendancy of military thinking. But the vast size of the U.S.S.R. and the Soviet bloc is not likely to give the Russians a feeling of being hemmed in and frustrated as happened in Germany and Italy, even though the capitalist encirclement theme may be played up for propaganda purposes.

104. The second possibility also seems to me unlikely. Certainly the situation inside the U.S.S.R. is not so monolithic or so stable as we often tend to think; and few of the basic economic, social and political problems facing the country have been solved since the new leadership took over. Nor is the problem of the leadership solved either. Nevertheless, it would be foolish to consider that the Russians are incapable of solving these questions and providing continuity of government. It may take a different form and it may not be so dynamic as that of Stalin, but some form of effective communist government is likely in the foreseeable future to function in the U.S.S.R.

105. One could argue that things may continue indefinitely much as they are, but Soviet society is not static and I think the evidence points to some kind of evolution. This could, of course, be in the direction of a tougher line, both internally and externally, but even if this took place I feel it would be temporary and primarily a question of personalities, and that the pressure is inexorably towards a loosening of the tight Stalinist type of dictatorship.

106. Some observers of the Soviet scene, like Isaac Deutscher, exaggerate when they anticipate a gradual development of Soviet society towards a form of communist democracy. There is no hint of that whatsoever in the U.S.S.R. and it would be quite contrary to Russian history. But it is possible for the more odious aspects of the régime to be modified. There is, as Sir Winston Churchill said, a great and pent-up longing among the mass of the peoples of the U.S.S.R. for peace and for a better way of life. The Soviet leaders cannot put off indefinitely the day when they must face up to this. As Soviet society becomes older it becomes more traditional and conservative. The revolutionary fervour grows dim and the new masters settle down into a respectable life, and a very busy one running their enormous country. And the prospects of risking it all in order to bring the benefits of revolution to other parts of the globe grow less attractive.

XII. Conclusion

107. If there is any validity in these arguments then one can draw a few conclusions. The first is that peace, or at least a state of "cold war", which passes for peace these days, can be maintained. This does not necessarily mean that either side abandons its hopes that eventually some or all of the rest of the world can be converted to its way of life. But it does mean that it should be possible to eliminate war as a means of bringing about changes.

108. I know of no expert on Soviet affairs, in particular among those who have been in the U.S.S.R. of recent years, who is not convinced that the Soviet leaders infinitely prefer to continue the struggle with capitalism on its present basis rather than to risk what they have gained by a contest of arms, and the manner in which weapons of destruction are developing is not likely to make them change their minds.

109. This does not mean that we need think that the Soviet leaders have abandoned any of their basic aims towards the West. It simply means that they have decided that it is no longer worth while to try to continue the struggle between the two systems on the plane of war. The competition goes on, but with war ruled out as a means of deciding the outcome, at least for the time being.

110. It would be falling into the most obvious trap, though one which was not so apparent in the days of the Popular Front, to think that co-existence meant an abandonment of all those aims for which generations of Marxists have fought. Therefore we must be prepared to struggle by peaceful means with the machinations of Soviet agents, propaganda and Communist parties.

111. If we think that the battle can be continued without war, and it is surely our solemn duty to pursue this belief as long as it is tenable, and if we think there is a good chance that the other side also hopes that war is avoidable, what can be done to make it possible to continue to live more or less peacefully with the Soviet world?

112. The first prerequisite is to achieve a more balanced view of the strengths and weaknesses of the adversary. Second, it should not be forgotten that even without communism Russia could represent a formidable threat to the rest of the world and that China, properly organised, will still mean 600,000,000 people and a huge land mass. Therefore the problem of co-existence cannot be based purely on the estimate of a straight struggle in terms of black and white between two ideologies.

113. Third, we must make a determined effort to avoid the assumption that war is inevitable. In our attitude towards the U.S.S.R. we should make it implicit that we do not intend to attack the Soviet Union and at the same time we should avoid action which might have the effect genuinely of frightening the Russians. For example, we cannot assume that there are no limits to Soviet patience in the face of encirclement by American bases. There is a point in establishing these bases at which they tend to create the very thing they were designed to avoid. Apart from all the political considerations, no great country could sit by and witness with indifference the progressive closing in of the enemy.

114. But this also poses problems with regard to our own peoples and that is of continuing to have to justify to them the necessity of heavy military and tax burdens without continuing the atmosphere of crisis. In this and indeed the whole question of our relations with the U.S.S.R. we must work out a compromise, since under no circumstances must the Soviet world again be tempted to think that because of western military weakness and psychological unpreparedness it could expand without serious risk to itself. We must therefore maintain as large a force as is consistent with the aim of discouraging the Soviet leaders from territorial aggression. I do not think this need necessarily mean the maintenance under arms of forces intended to match the Russians man to man. The same purpose would be served by a clear indication that aggression in any specific part of the world would touch off war with the western powers.

115. In a certain sense by trying to do this in Europe we are chasing off after the Russians down one road while they in the meantime have gone in another direction. If, in fact, the Russians never seriously considered the possibility of outright military expansion in Europe then the attempt to build up a force capable of meeting this aggression man to man is misplaced. There are, of course, apart from this, obvious reasons why the power vacuum in Western Europe had to be filled, but they are not the main reasons advanced publicly to justify re-armament.

116. If there is merit in the theory that massive re-armament mostly at the expense of the economic programme in some ways missed the point in Europe, there might also be justification for thinking the same about South-East Asia. In other words, if the Indo-China problem were settled, is it necessary to draw up a Maginot Line around the rest of South-East Asia, or that portion of it which it is decided must be defended, and prepare for a military threat which may not materialise at least in the form anticipated? In particular it would be unfortunate if the military defence of South-East Asia were to interfere with economic aid since this would help to create the conditions under which a crumbling away of the free nations could take place without the need of an outright invasion. Again, the important thing is surely to make it clear that certain actions by the Soviet bloc would automatically involve it in war with the western powers. If there can be no shadow of a doubt about a Western bluff, and if there were evidence that effective military action would be possible, then this is just as good a deterrent as actually manning a defensive line, and does not tie down large numbers of Western troops.

117. This is a pessimistic counsel in many ways because it calls for de facto recognition that communism has conquered a large portion of the world, and it requires abandoning the peoples of Eastern Europe to their fate. It amounts to an admission of a division of the world into two spheres, something the Russians have been aiming at since Yalta, and therefore is an admission of partial failure on the part of the West. But it is the only realistic policy unless we are prepared to fight to liberate the satellites or to destroy communism. If we are not going to do the latter then we must accept the alternative, which is to try to live in a divided world.

118. The Russians admittedly do not make this very easy for us. There are signs, however, that they wish to adopt slightly more civilised attitudes in dealing with the West; of which Molotov's behaviour at Berlin and Geneva is a sign. They seem prepared to engage in more normal activities in the fields of international sport, science, cultural activities and so on. They may eventually come to participate in their own peculiar way in the work of the Specialised Agencies of the United Nations. They may even admit tourists once more to the U.S.S.R.

119. These are all small things and they do not change the fundamental realities. But they are a small step in the right direction and we should do everything in our power to encourage this trend which may in time have some mellowing effect on the Soviet concept of living with their neighbours. If it seems inconsistent with Soviet continuation of terrorist and espionage activities and support of communist parties abroad, we must recognise that much in the U.S.S.R. is inconsistent, starting with the basic paradox that one of the most likeable, human and kind peoples in the world is also capable of the most atrocious barbarities.

120. There is also a curious but, I think, quite noticeable dichotomy in the Russian attitude to the West. At the same time they wish to play the role of Marxist revolutionaries leading the U.S.S.R. in the defence of the peoples of the world against the capitalist enemy, and yet to be accepted as equal members of the club. Most educated Russians, even those of the younger generations, do like to think of themselves as Europeans steeped in the literature, history and philosophy of the main stream of European civilisation. I could detect at Molotov's reception in Moscow last November 7, when the Soviet leaders fraternised with the Western ambassadors, a certain note of nostalgia for the days of the wartime partnership. And partnership with the Czechs and the Chinese is no substitute.

121. Basically, however, the Soviet leaders are going to continue to approach the question of relations with the West from an antagonistic stand-point which, combined with the traditional Russian xenophobia and inferiority complex will result in secretiveness, duplicity and unpredictability. And in spite of temporary surface changes in this attitude we will have to accept these norms of behaviour on the part of the Russians for a long time to come.

122. This often incomprehensible Soviet attitude to the West complicates our task. If we add to this the feeling in the West that the present sorry state of affairs is largely the fault of the Russians, there may be a tendency to conclude that it is up to them alone to take actions intended to improve relations. This would be a purely justifiable feeling if we were dealing with some people closer to our background and civilisation. But we cannot equate the Russians with the Americans, and it is up to us to make allowances and to exercise patience. The Russians will respond to a combination of strength, determination and absolute correctness in any dealings with them, which is perhaps the reason why they never took any reprisals against the Canadian Embassy in Moscow as a result of the Gouzenko affair and in fact treated us better than most of the other Western missions — because the Canadian Government acted with firmness but correctness.³¹

123. We are not living in a static world. Given a period of peace there is just a chance that developments inside the Soviet bloc will tend towards a maturing of Soviet society, and a gradual settling down into a pattern of relations with the outside world which will make it possible to live together, if not very happily, then at least not on the ruins of each other's cities. In the meantime we might recall

TRAVEL RESTRICTIONS ON SOVIET EMBASSY PERSONNEL

As you are aware, we have imposed certain restrictions on the freedom of travel within Canada of members of the Soviet Embassy. These restrictions, first introduced by our Note of March 10, 1952³³ to the Soviet Embassy, and subsequently modified by our Notes of October 27, 1952⁺ and August 26, 1953,³⁴ are as follows:

(a) Whenever any members of the Embassy staff, or Soviet members of Embassy households, wish to travel beyond a 75-mile radius from Ottawa, the Embassy must submit a standard notification form in duplicate to this Department or, in the case of Service members of the Embassy, to the Department of National Defence;

(b) This notification must be received at least 48 hours, exclusive of Sundays and holidays, before the time of departure; and

(c) The notification must include the following information: name and rank, means of transportation, route and destination including addresses, proposed dates of departure, and arrival and departure at each stopover, and of return to Ottawa.

While these restrictions were imposed originally as a retaliatory measure, following a NATO Council discussion on the desirability of countering the restrictions imposed on foreign diplomats in the Soviet Union, the RCMP have found them very helpful for security purposes. Not only do they enable us to follow the movement and activity of Soviet officials in Canada more closely, but it makes it more difficult for these officials to engage undetected in improper activities. The importance of this aspect of the restrictions is underlined by a striking fact unearthed during the Petrov case: four-fifths of the Soviet Embassy staff in Canberra were involved in one way or another in the activities of the KGB, the successor organization to the MVD in the intelligence field.³⁵

The RCMP have reported to us the two following matters which have come to their notice during their surveillance of the travels of Soviet officials in recent months:

(a) Certain members of the Embassy, including the Ambassador, deviate from time to time from their notified route; and

(b) Members of the Military Attaché's staff have been photographing industrial establishments in the Hamilton area.

These matters have been considered at a meeting held in the Department. Regarding the first, it was decided that the deviations already noted should be recorded, and that future flagrant or repeated deviations should be brought to the Ambassador's attention.

The discussion of Soviet photographic activities was inconclusive. The RCMP representative argued that such activities were open to prosecution under the Official Secrets Act. Our Legal Adviser, who was present, dissented: in any case, he pointed out that such action would not be in accordance with diplomatic custom. He felt that if we desired to restrict photographic activities by the Soviet Embassy, it would be better to devise restrictions comparable to our travel restrictions, and then declare any serious offender persona non grata. The possibility that such additional regulations would lead to new restrictions on our people in Moscow, however, prevented the meeting from deciding that new restrictions, on photographic activities, should be imposed at this time.

The purpose of this memorandum is twofold:

(a) To bring to your attention that our travel restrictions, which originally had merely a retaliatory purpose, are now making a valuable contribution to our counter-intelligence, and to seek your approval for this broadening of their scope; and

(b) To bring to your attention the two matters reported to us by the RCMP.

CONFIDENTIAL

CONSULTATIONS WITH CZECHOSLOVAKIA ON TRADE AND FINANCIAL MATTERS

At its meeting on December 29³⁶ Cabinet agreed that Canada should accede to the request of the Government of Czechoslovakia to hold consultations in accordance with Article XXII of the GATT on special valuation procedures employed by Canada in respect to certain imports from Czechoslovakia and that once arrangements for such consultations had been made further consideration would be given by Cabinet to the course to be pursued. Ministers also decided that it should be understood that Canada's willingness to consult in no way altered the obligation of Czechoslovakia under the post-war credit agreement. It was suggested in the Memorandum to the Cabinet that both subjects might be discussed during any consultations.

Agreement has now been reached with the Czech authorities to hold talks in Ottawa around the middle of May. The Czech delegation will be authorized "to discuss certain questions of trade policy and questions arising from the Financial Agreement of 1945 and supplements".³⁷ It is envisaged that the consultations will involve consideration of:

- (a) the present practice with respect to revising the valuation of certain Czech exports for customs purposes;
- (b) Czech obligations under the post-war loan;
- (c) the prospects for trade between Canada and Czechoslovakia.

Since it would appear desirable to avoid any impression that the settlement of the loan can be made dependent on the outcome of the discussions on valuation procedures it is assumed that these three subjects should be dealt with separately in the consultations with the Czech delegation. Inasmuch as the present practice of increasing the declared values of various imports from Czechoslovakia by something like 50% for duty purposes gives rise to administrative problems, there would seem to be merit in working out with Czechoslovakia more normal arrangements for verifying values consistent with the requirements of Canadian law in those particular cases where problems may exist.

In these circumstances, with the concurrence of the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of National Revenue, I recommend that:

(a) as suggested in the note to the Czech authorities the consultations should take place with as little publicity as possible;

(b) the consultations with Czechoslovakia be conducted by representatives from the Departments of External Affairs, Finance, Trade and Commerce and National Revenue;

(c) on the matter of valuing Czech goods for duty purposes the Canadian negotiators should seek the cooperation of the Government of Czechoslovakia in carrying out the intention of Canadian Customs laws and, in particular, seek their agreement to admit a Canadian Customs official to the country in those cases where specific complaints are received and give him the minimum information and facilities considered essential by the Minister of National Revenue;

(d) on the question of the loan, the Canadian negotiators will endeavour to obtain the most favourable terms possible from a Canadian point of view. Should this involve any departure from the present legal obligations of Czechoslovakia, the prior concurrence of the Minister of Finance should be obtained;

(e) concerning general trade the Canadian negotiators should indicate that the Canadian authorities welcome trade between Canada and Czechoslovakia in goods which are not subject to restrictions on security grounds;

(f) any conclusion reached on each of these points during the consultations would be subject to approval by Cabinet and would be provisional until Cabinet has had an opportunity to consider them as a whole.³⁸

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 152-54

CONSULTATIONS WITH CZECHOSLOVAKIA ON TRADE AND FINANCIAL MATTERS

At its meeting on May 13th, Cabinet considered the line to be pursued by Canadian officials during the talks which were to be held in Ottawa with a delegation from Czechoslovakia. It will be recalled that the Canadian negotiating group was to seek the cooperation of Czechoslovakia in carrying out the intentions of Canadian customs laws and in particular to obtain permission to send a customs official to Czechoslovakia in those cases where specific complaints are received. On the question of the loan the Canadian negotiators were instructed to obtain the best settlement of the loan possible from a Canadian point of view and should this involve any departure from the present legal obligations of Czechoslovakia, the prior concurrence of the Minister of Finance should be secured. With respect to general trade between Canada and Czechoslovakia the Canadian representatives were to explain that the Canadian Government welcomes trade between Canada and Czechoslovakia within the restrictions imposed on security grounds.

2. After consultations with the delegation from Czechoslovakia during the past three weeks, provisional agreement has been reached with them on the problem of valuing Czech imports into Canada in accordance with the provisions of Canadian Customs laws and with respect to the question of settling the outstanding loan.

3. The basis of understanding arrived at with the delegation from Czechoslovakia on the question of valuing Czech imports recognizes that by reason of the character of the economic system of Czechoslovakia neither fair market values nor cost of production as prescribed by sub-sections (1) and (3) respectively of Section 35 of the Canadian Customs Act can be satisfactorily established. In the circumstances it is proposed to resort to sub-section (2) of Section 35 which provides that where valuation under sub-section (1) cannot be arrived at, the value for duty purposes shall be the nearest ascertainable equivalent. While such equivalent may not be ascertainable from available data from Czechoslovakia, home market values obtaining in other countries may provide a basis for determining the nearest ascertainable equivalent. In the view of the Department of National Revenue this interpretation of Section 35 is the only one practicable in the circumstances short of an amendment to the Customs Act. It should, however, be pointed out that this interpretation may be open to question in the unlikely event that this matter is brought before the Tariff Board or the Exchequer Court. In such an event, consideration would have to be given to the possibility of devising an amendment to the Customs Act to provide for valuation procedures applicable to imports from a country whose economy is wholly under state control.

4. In practice it is expected that the certified invoice value would generally be acceptable as the value for duty purposes. However, in the event the Canadian Customs authorities found that some goods from Czechoslovakia were being imported at questionable values, the Department of National Revenue would communicate with the Legation of Czechoslovakia in Ottawa or with the Canadian Legation in Prague. To facilitate the actual operation of this method of valuing Czech goods for import duty purposes the delegation of Czechoslovakia has signified the agreement of their Government to the appointment of an official from the Department of National Revenue to the Canadian Legation in Prague as an Attaché. This official would be accorded full diplomatic status and would have access to the Czech Ministry of Foreign Trade which would facilitate discussions with competent Czech officials responsible for the values shown on customs invoices and the selling prices of goods exported to Canada. In addition, this Attaché would provide the Czech authorities with information concerning laws and regulations governing imports into Canada and thereby assist the Czech trading agencies in meeting the requirements of Canadian customs laws and practices.

5. On the question of the loan the delegation of Czechoslovakia has proposed a schedule of payments acceptable to the Minister of Finance. Under this schedule the Government of Czechoslovakia would pay on December 31, 1954, the accumulated interest ($624,375) on the full amount and pay the capital ($9,990,000) in five equal instalments plus interest over a period of two years commencing the 30th of June, 1955, and ending the 30th of June, 1957. It should be noted, however, that the Czechoslovak Government has made these payments dependent upon the implementation of the Customs arrangements described above.

6. On general trade, the delegation of Czechoslovakia has been informed by officials in the Department of Trade and Commerce with respect to the general nature of present restrictions on the export of strategic commodities to Czechoslovakia. The Czechs spoke of their interest in increasing sales to Canada and provided the Department of Trade and Commerce with a list of products which they are interested in purchasing. This list includes meat of all kinds, lard, butter, feed grains, wheat, hides, skins, glycerine and pharmaceuticals of Canadian manufacture. In addition, the Czech delegation mentioned a number of commodities which are subject to export restrictions and Canadian officials have undertaken to investigate the possibility of licensing for export certain of these commodities within our general export control policies. The delegation of Czechoslovakia expressed the willingness of their Government to authorize the competent Czechoslovak import organizations to purchase during 1954 Canadian goods at least in the amount representing the value of Czech imports into Canada in the same period.

7. Memoranda on customs arrangements and general trade on which provisional agreement has been reached between the delegation of Czechoslovakia and the Canadian negotiators are attached.†

8. In the light of the above considerations, it is recommended that:

(a) the Minister of National Revenue be authorized to accept the arrangements described in the attached Memorandum on customs matters;

(b) the Minister of Finance be authorized to accept arrangements for the settlement of the loan, described in paragraph 5 above;

(c) the Minister of Trade and Commerce be authorized to accept the understandings recorded in the attached Memorandum on trade matters.

While it would be undesirable to give publicity to detailed arrangements, particularly with respect to customs matters, Ministers will doubtless wish to consider the form and substance of any public announcement concerning these consultations.³⁹

FUTURE OF CBC INTERNATIONAL SERVICE

I. The International Service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was established by P.C. 8168 of September 18, 1942, began operations in December, 1944, and was formally inaugurated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on February 25, 1945. Cabinet approved the founding of this Service on the recommendation of the Minister of National War Services with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Parliamentary proposals to begin Canadian short-wave broadcasting operations antedate the Second World War. In 1938 the House of Commons Standing Committee on Radio Broadcasting reported to Parliament:

³⁹ Approuvé par le Cabinet le 17 juin 1954./Approved by Cabinet, June 17, 1954.

"Your Committee⁴⁰ was impressed with the importance of the establishment, at an early date, of a high power shortwave broadcasting station. Such a station, your Committee believes, would be a great utility in interpreting and advertising Canada abroad and in facilitating an exchange of programmes between Canada and other broadcasting system. ..."

In the following year (1939) a similar Committee repeated this recommendation and added:

"... We desire to draw the attention of the government to the imminent possibility that further delay in proceeding with the undertaking may result in Canada losing altogether the shortwave channels registered in her name, and as a consequence being shut out of the field entirely."

In 1942 another similar Committee said:

"The reasons for the establishment of a shortwave system in Canada were compelling enough before the war to lead two parliamentary committees and the Board of Governors and officers of the CBC to express themselves in favour of it. The outbreak and course of the war have powerfully reinforced such reasons. Only a few allied broadcasting stations now reach enemy and occupied territory. A Canadian service would strengthen and supplement the existing British and American services. It would be particularly valuable if a British shortwave station were damaged. It would assist the cause of the United Nations in South America. It would supply the United Kingdom and other countries with information about Canada and the national war effort. ... Important as such a service would be during the war, it would also be of the greatest possible usefulness in establishing new areas of understanding, goodwill and trade after the war."

The shortwave service as established by the Order-in-Council was placed under the administration and control of the CBC. The relationship of the new service with the Department of External Affairs was set down in these words:

"In view of the fact that such shortwave broadcasts would constitute a factor affecting Canada's relations with the other countries of the Commonwealth, and with foreign countries, the work of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in this field should be carried on in consultation with the Department of External Affairs."

2. At the end of December, 1944, facilities and staff for the International Service had been procured and transmissions began in English and French. These included programmes for the Canadian forces. The Service got into full swing in 1945 when Czech, German (including some broadcasts for Austria), Dutch, Spanish and Portuguese (for Latin America) programmes were started. In 1947, Danish, Norwegian and Swedish were added, in 1948 Italian, in 1950 Finnish (once a week), in 1951 Russian, in 1952 Ukrainian and in 1953 Polish. Recorded programmes in Greek for broadcast over Radio Athens also have been produced as required. At present the language services are all in operation. In addition, the International Service carries

Parl[imentary] Comm[ittee] programmes for the Canadian forces in Europe and in the Far East (by relay through Radio Australia). A substantial number of the shortwave programmes are relayed on medium (broadcast band) wave in other countries (United Kingdom, Germany, Sweden, Chile, Brazil, etc.). In addition, transcriptions on discs or tape are produced and provided to radio stations or networks in other countries and are widely used.

II. Scope and Value of Shortwave Broadcasting as a Medium

3. It is an indication of the importance attached throughout the world to shortwave broadcasting as a medium for the influencing of men's minds that at latest count (December 1952) no fewer than 66 countries operate national shortwave broadcasting services. The extent of these operations varies, in terms of broadcast hours from the massive Soviet effort (not including Satellites) of close to 700 hours weekly down to a very few hours weekly. Canada at present ranks only thirty-second (less than 100 hours weekly) in the list of broadcasting nations and is roughly in the company of countries such as the Netherlands, Ceylon, Norway and Greece.⁴¹ Some nations of comparable or lesser international importance feel justified in exerting a greater effort in this field — Australia, Argentina, Poland, India, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Brazil, etc. The opinion of the Soviet Union and its associates on the importance of shortwave broadcasting, as expressed by Communist international radio activities, is perhaps not irrelevant to the present assessment. In addition to the formidable volume of Communist broadcasts to the free world, the Soviet Union and the satellites have thought it worthwhile to devote very considerable technical resources and highly trained personnel to jamming operations. They would certainly not have done so without a clear basis for the belief that Western broadcasts are effective.

4. Radio is perhaps the only means of communication which is not subject to governmentally imposed barriers such as censorship and thus enjoys an important advantage over other media such as the press, pamphlets and films in parts of the world where governments may prohibit the free flow of information.⁴²

5. There is considerable scepticism in Canada and the United States about the listening audience for shortwave broadcasts. This is not unreasonable in the light of North American listening habits but it overlooks the fact that apparently North American listening habits are not typical of world listening habits. Surveys by the BBC and the Voice of America indicate that a far higher proportion of the population in Europe, Latin America and, to a lesser extent, the Middle East own and use shortwave receivers regularly. The abundance of high-powered medium wave stations, geared to popular tastes, accepted as a normal condition in North America is certainly less characteristic in other parts of the world.⁴³ The CBC has prepared some figures on the number of shortwave receiving sets throughout the world

⁴¹ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

⁴² Note marginale :/Marginal note:

⁴³ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Why

which indicate, at the least, that if shortwave has no audience it is not for lack of the necessary receivers. These figures show about 58 million shortwave receivers in the world, with about 50 million of these within the CBC target areas. Sample estimates of numbers of shortwave receivers for a few countries or areas are:

France	-	6,600,000
Germany (West)	-	7,100,000
Germany (East)	-	2,500,000
Scandinavia	-	5,800,000
Brazil	-	850,000
Spanish America	-	3,400,000
Holland	-	1,200,000

The question as to how many set owners used their sets to listen to Canadian programmes is, of course, difficult to answer and it is next to impossible to reach any thoroughly reliable and firm conclusions in this regard. However, audience surveys and the evidence of "fan mail" provide some sort of basis for faith that CBC-IS has a respectable following, although it makes no pretensions to the size of audience tuned in to BBC, Voice of America or the privately supported Radio Free Europe.

III. Shortwave Transmissions and Canada's International Relations

6. International broadcasting exists, broadly speaking, to advance a country's national interests in the international sphere. These interests may be political, economic, commercial, ideological or cultural, or all of these. Depending on Canada's relations with the governments of the individual countries concerned, Canadian broadcasts may be transmitted with the consent or support of a particular government or "over the head" and without the approval of that government. In broad terms Canadian broadcasts are composed of two principal ingredients: (1) General information about Canada and its people; (2) Information and opinion broadcast with specific political purposes. This is usually known as "psychological (or political) warfare" for want of a better term. Canadian broadcasts to behind the Iron Curtain are conducted for psychological warfare purposes, although in the process and serving the political end, much "Canadiana" is included in these programmes. Broadcasts to friendly countries, on the other hand, are devoted largely to non-political subjects and the "projection of Canada". However, as we also have political aims to serve in friendly countries, the psychological warfare aspect must be present here as well, though less frequently and less obviously. The recipe for mixing the political and non-political ingredients must vary with the importance to Canada of the political relations and attitudes of each country concerned. For example, broadcasts to Germany are more highly political than broadcasts to Brazil.

7. The CBC-IS originally was set only the task of maintaining and strengthening Canada's relations with other countries by making Canada better known and understood throughout the world. It was only at a later stage that the Service was asked to deal in psychological warfare. The more purely information task continued to provide the basis for most scripts. In this role, CBC-IS forms part of the apparatus for official Canadian information activity abroad and, in a sense, is justified if all information work abroad is justified and on the same basis. If the comparative value of various information media is examined, it is probably doubtful that the spoken word can compare in impact with the written word or with the film. However, information about Canada is inevitably restricted, by means of films, pamphlets or news stories, to a relatively restricted number of people in foreign lands, whereas radio listeners comprise a vast audience, comprised both of those who listen to shortwave and to rebroadcasts on medium wave. The yardstick of listeners' letters is certainly not precise but it is indicative that the Voice of Canada has given a fair number of foreign people a better knowledge of Canada than they previously had.

8. A large part of the psychological warfare job carried out by CBC-IS could not be conducted in any other way. The broadcasts in Russian, Ukrainian, Czechoslovak and Polish are the unique means whereby the Canadian government can reach the peoples of these countries. It is generally accepted that an effort to explain Western life and policy to the people of the Communist countries is worthwhile and merits an expenditure of effort and money. If even a modest degree of success is obtained in counteracting incessant Communist propaganda and disabusing the Soviet people of some of the false concepts forced upon them, if the faith in the values of democracy and Christian civilization can be maintained at a healthy level in those countries more recently taken under Soviet sway, the moderate costs of radio broadcasting are well spent. The question, of course, is whether these (limited) objectives are attained by Western broadcasts in general and Canadian broadcasts in particular. The best witnesses for the defence of the broadcasters are certainly the Communist governments of Eastern Europe. These governments, according to Intelligence estimates, may be operating in the neighbourhood of one thousand transmitters for jamming. This involves, certainly, a very heavy expenditure. (The estimated cost for 2 new transmitters for CBC-IS is around $3 million.) Secondly, operation and maintenance of jamming equipment require the services of an army of trained technicians who could be used otherwise to good advantage. This costly and intense activity is surely a tribute to the effectiveness of Western broadcasts. Communist fear of Western radio was expressed recently to the Central Committee of the Polish Workers (Communist) Party by Radkiewicz, Minister of Public Security:

"A serious problem is the mobilization of the Party and the community for the struggle against hostile propaganda disseminated by imperialist broadcasting stations. ... We must realize that enemy radio propaganda is the most important source of inspiration of various diversionistic gossip and rumours seeking to arouse panic in the market, war fears, etc. We must appreciate that, under the influence of radio inspiration, there have been carried out not a few crimes and offences. ... We cannot see this and simply do nothing about it. We cannot permit an attitude of indifference to this phenomenon. For the struggle on this sector, party organizations must be included on a broad front."

It is perhaps unnecessary to elaborate further that Western broadcasts are sufficiently important to merit serious concern for the governments behind the Iron Curtain. It is more difficult to get clinching evidence of the specific effectiveness of Canadian broadcasts. Interrogations of escapers from the Communist countries sometimes refer, inter alia, to CBC broadcasts being listened to. The U.S.S.R., Czechoslovakia and Poland have, from the start, been apprehensive enough of the effect of Canadian broadcasts to jam them regularly. The BBC and Voice of America thought well enough of CBC Iron Curtain broadcasts to suggest an arrangement whereby the Russian broadcasts of all three would be synchronized to lengthen the odds that at least one Western programme would get through the jamming and be heard by Soviet listeners. There are also a few flimsy straws in the wind to prove that live listeners to CBC programmes exist behind the Iron Curtain: Gerald Clark of the Montreal Star, apparently by purest chance, met two on his brief visit to Moscow. Our diplomatic staff in Warsaw has talked to regular listeners. A trickle of letters, either boldly through the mail or dropped in the Legation's letter-slot, still come from Czechoslovakia (which provided a large fan-mail before 1948 and presumably has no fewer listeners in these days when captive populations are avid for news of the outside world). A few-odd letters come from East Germany and these indicate there is a fair listening audience there. There would appear to be sufficient evidence, even if by its nature it is not conclusive, to justify the continuation of these broadcasts. Moreover, there is now the probability that NATO may wish to seek some form of technical co-ordination of broadcasts by the NATO countries to the Communist countries. This would scarcely seem the time to curtail or drop Canada's modest participation in this sector of the Cold War — a sector which, it may well be contended, contributes to the defence of the West in the same way but in lesser degree as does the military build-up.

9. A further, and perhaps less important, aspect of the CBC role in psychological warfare is that of conveying political ideas to friendly countries. Much of the effectiveness of this activity will have to be taken on faith, if at all, but the effort is probably worth making. Canada's expressed interest in the development of Western military strength,⁴⁴ information about Canada's contribution to this effort and support for European initiatives to this end may conceivably influence some Frenchmen to the support of the E.D.C., may cause some Dane to pause in his hostility to NATO commitments, some German to prefer a close relationship for his country with the West rather than a return to armed nationalism or risky neutralism. This belief that radio broadcasts may influence the political attitudes of people in friendly countries is held by the United States and United Kingdom and others. If it is well grounded, there is surely room for Canada to make its own contribution, a contribution which may be surprisingly effective since the "Great Power" stigma does not attach to Canada and the Voice of Canada is not heard with distrust or resentment in Western Europe.

10. The comments up to this point have largely related to broadcasts to Europe. CBC broadcasts to Latin America have been conducted since 1946 and, from the evidence of listeners' letters, the Latin American Service has a reasonable audience. The broadcasts have carried a good deal of straight "Canadiana", entertainment and cultural content. The first aim of this Service is considered to be the promotion of trade by maintaining or developing a generally friendly and respectful attitude towards Canada. The political content has been small and usually indirect. Latterly the BBC and Voice of America have ceased shortwave transmissions to Latin America on grounds of economy, whereas the Soviet Union and satellites have increased their broadcasting time to this area several hundred fold. Quite possibly this situation suggests not only a political reason for continuance of this Service but perhaps also the desirability of providing a higher political content for these broadcasts to combat Communist propaganda ventures.

11. A further very important consideration affecting a decision whether or not to continue a governmental international broadcasting operation relates to the possible future. This memorandum has been devoted to a discussion of the CBC-IS in peacetime and the Cold War. The urgency and utility of international broadcasting becomes much more apparent and compelling in time of war when every resource of the nation must be brought to bear on a military and political victory. It needs little imagination to foresee that in the event of war the Government, on the basis of its own assessment of war requirements, because of official and parliamentary recommendations and, no doubt, because of insistence by allied nations, will wish to play its part in an allied propaganda effort. In such an effort shortwave broadcasting would inevitably claim a prominent role. It is not possible by virtue of an official decision alone to engage in an effective radio propaganda effort. Technical and engineering facilities, accommodation and various paraphernalia are required.⁴⁵ Above all, experienced personnel — engineers, management, scriptwriters, foreign language experts, broadcasters and others — all are essential to a successful operation. Even if the existing International Service is in full activity when a state of war might be declared, a considerable readjustment of the existing apparatus would be required. If, however, the whole apparatus had been dismantled and, more important, the trained personnel dispersed, it would take a regrettably long time to mount an effective radio operation. Moreover, it is highly improbable that Canada would be in a position to maintain the shortwave frequencies allocated to it if it failed to make regular use of them. The international competition for frequencies is such that loss of the allocated frequencies might paralyze for some time a Canadian effort to re-enter the international broadcasting field in case of war. While the potential requirement for a wartime shortwave apparatus does not, by itself, justify the peacetime apparatus, the importance of that potential requirement should surely be given full weight before any decision is made to dispense with existing machinery and trained personnel.

12. It seems possible that in the thinking which has been given to the problems of CBC-IS there may have been some confusion of the two related questions: (1) Is shortwave broadcasting a good thing for Canada to be doing? and (2) If so, is the job being satisfactorily performed by CBC-IS? Perhaps doubts about the latter question have carried over, unnoticed, into the former and larger question. This memorandum, of course, is largely concerned with the former. If it appears that Ministerial concern is fundamentally about how the job is being done, it would be idle to deny that much improvement can still be made in the CBC-IS operation. I think the programmes have improved in the last year or so, at least to the extent that the International Service now receives and makes use of information and guidance on international affairs and Canadian foreign policy. The standard is certainly not yet up to that of, say, the BBC and perhaps this is too much to expect for a long time to come. It may well be, however, that the pace of improvement could be accelerated if more or different outside attention were brought to bear on the work of the Service. One means might be to form (or resurrect) an Advisory Committee of officials to follow the operation of the Service from month to month and suggest any desirable changes. Another, but more drastic, means might be to enlist the services of some outside radio expert to scrutinize, analyse and make recommendations concerning the future work of the International Service. This latter suggestion might, of course, not recommend itself to CBC and, moreover, it seems most probable that any expert would feel bound to make recommendations involving further financial outlay — for new, high-powered transmitters, etc. More detailed suggestions along these lines might be made if it seems that the concern of the special Cabinet Committee lies in this area.

⁴⁵ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Defence Organizations

13. In summary, it is recommended that the operations of CBC International Service be continued at approximately the present level of activity.⁴⁶

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION:
INTERNATIONAL BROADCASTING POLICY

At a Cabinet meeting held on January 7, 1954, a Special Cabinet Committee was established to review the purposes, operations and accomplishments of the International Service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to submit recommendations to the government as to future policy concerning this service.

After examining some of the more important aspects of the problem, the Cabinet Committee appointed a Special Committee of officials to make a detailed study of the C.B.C. International Service and to submit a report as to the best means by which economies could be made in that service. Such a report, containing a series of recommendations, was prepared by the Committee of officials and submitted to the Cabinet Committee for consideration on May 25.

facilities — could they be used — rented — sold [?][?] UN NATO

The Chairman of the Cabinet Committee has now directed that this report be circulated for consideration by Cabinet. Copy of this report, dated May 22, is attached hereto.

Members of the Cabinet Committee were generally inclined to endorse the recommendations set out in the report submitted by the Committee of officials. However, there was some discussion as to the expediency of terminating the Ukrainian service, as recommended by the Committee of officials. In the course of discussing this matter, it was noted that the Ukrainian service of the C.B.C. was completely separate from the Russian service and that a sizeable portion of its programmes consisted of original material prepared specially for that service. It was estimated that complete discontinuance of the service might result in an annual saving of approximately $50,000. There was a suggestion that the Ukrainian service might be continued, but as a part of the Russian service with programmes consisting largely of translations of the Russian programmes. If this were done, the annual cost of the service might be reduced to approximately $20,000, but this action might be regarded as more of an affront to the Ukrainian minority than complete abolition.

Report from Special Committee of Officials on International Broadcasting Policy to Special Cabinet Committee

[Ottawa], May 22, 1954

1. The Committee of officials requested to consider the policies, practices and budgets on international broadcasting activities of the C.B.C. has held a series of meetings to study further material supplied by the Corporation and by the Department of External Affairs, and has had the benefit of reports from Trade and Commerce and Immigration officers overseas on the value of such broadcasts from their point of view.

Purposes and Value of International Broadcasts

2. The present purposes of the international services have been considered to be, in summary, the following:

- (a) to secure general political and social goodwill and understanding for Canada in European, Latin American and Commonwealth countries;
- (b) to project Canada abroad — which is taken to mean the showing of Canadian life and culture to people of these countries and thus to inform and educate such people about Canadian aims and achievements;

(c) to provide a reliable source of international news for the people of the Soviet Union; to counteract Communist propaganda about conditions in Western countries and about the alleged warlike intentions of these countries; and, through reliable news, factual information and a vigorous statement of our views on current topics, to encourage the Soviet people both to question what their government tells them and eventually to oppose the aggressive policies of the Soviet government which have reduced some nations to subjection and forced many nations into measures of defence;

(d) to provide such a reliable source of news to people in Poland, Czechoslovakia and East Germany and to keep alive their contact with and desire for Western democratic life, and thus to frustrate, in whatever measure possible, the efforts of the U.S.S.R. to dominate them;

(e) to assist Canadian trade and commercial relations; and

(f) to assist in encouraging emigration of suitable people to Canada from Europe.

(An incidental advantage of the C.B.C. international service is to satisfy certain minority groups in Canada that wish to see contact maintained with peoples in Europe from which they originate, notably Ukrainians and Poles.)

3. The Committee has come to the conclusion that the present shortwave broadcasting service can achieve some of these aims but not all of them, and that it cannot achieve some of them in sufficient measure to warrant the costs involved.

4. In particular, the Committee believes that shortwave broadcasting serves a useful and valuable purpose in reaching behind the Iron Curtain to the people of the U.S.S.R., Poland, Czechoslovakia and East Germany. Its effectiveness here cannot be measured, but it is the only means available and the efforts of the U.S.S.R. to jam such broadcasts suggest it is worthwhile. The Committee believes more of the effort of the CBC-IS should be concentrated on this part of the work and the aims of policy should be clarified along the lines suggested below.

5. On the other hand, the Committee believes that shortwave broadcasting accomplishes relatively little in promoting Canadian trade or emigration to Canada. It does not appear to be reaching a sufficient number of people who might be influenced in respect of trade and migration nor does it seem likely to influence materially those it does reach. The Committee recommends that efforts should not be expended in trying to secure these purposes by this means. This should be borne in mind in determining both the extent and content of the programmes.

6. The Committee believes the International Service succeeds, in some measure, in securing goodwill for Canada in Western Europe and Latin America and in "projecting Canada" to the people there who listen to it. On the other hand, the Committee feels that too much value should not be set on these accomplishments and this means of securing them must be critically and recurrently appraised in comparison with other means and in relation to costs. On the whole, the majority of the Committee recommend that the general services to Western Europe and Latin America be curtailed and simplified in order to devote more time and effort to broadcasts behind the Curtain and to effect some saving in the total expenditure on shortwave broadcasting.

The Russian Programmes

7. The Committee, as noted, believes this programme is worthwhile and should be expanded. It is evident that the limitations on transmitter time and its use for programmes to Western Europe limit the full effectiveness of the programmes to the U.S.S.R. The Committee suggests that priority be given the Russian service.

8. In regard to policy, the Committee suggests that the government should approve the following principles to be followed in the Russian service:

(a) it should broadcast truthful news selected to be of interest to the intellectual and managerial classes in Russia (including the military), among whom the listeners are most likely to be found and who seem likely to be the only ones able to have any influence on Russian action;

(b) it should include political commentary on international affairs reflecting Canadian policy and typical Canadian viewpoints and should stress the fundamental tenet of Canadian foreign policy which is to develop mutually satisfactory relations with the U.S.S.R. as well as with other countries and to ensure, at the same time, that Canada can effectively resist aggression;

(c) enough should be included of our own internal differences of view and political controversy to suggest to the listeners that this is not simply government propaganda and that our political institutions are both really free and interesting;

(d) it should include sufficient other material to indicate that Canadians are not solely interested in or obsessed by political and international affairs, but are doing other things that are of interest to the class of persons in Russia specified above;

(e) it should also endeavour to arouse serious doubts in the minds of Russian listeners not only as to the veracity of their leaders' pronouncements on the political aims of other countries but also as to the intrinsic worth of Soviet policies, both foreign and domestic;

(f) as a long term aim, the programmes should be directed to suggesting that peaceful relations between Russia and the West are possible, and that both have much to do that is more constructive and more satisfying than carrying on a cold war or planning a hot one.

The Satellite Programmes

9. The Committee believes that the highest priority should also be given to programmes to the satellite countries — Poland, Czechoslovakia and East Germany, at the expense of programmes to Western Europe. This would include the allocation of more time and better time. It would not appear to require the addition of more staff for this work, except in filling vacancies, but the Committee feels that money is well spent in securing the highest quality staff possible for the creative and analytical side of this work in view of the high overheads involved in carrying on the programmes in any form. The Committee feels that the German programme must be treated as both a "behind the curtain" programme and one to friendly Western Germany as well.

10. In regard to policy, the Committee feels that while there must not be any clear inconsistency between the Russian and satellite programmes, and while many of the principles set out in paragraph 8 above with regard to the Russian programmes will apply equally to the satellites, there are, in this latter case, special considerations which should be borne in mind by those responsible for determining the general nature of these programmes. The more important of these considerations are set out hereunder.

(a) In many satellite countries, particularly Czechoslovakia and Poland, there undoubtedly exists considerable sympathy for the West. The main purpose of the programmes to the satellite countries should be to encourage this trend since the mere existence in these countries of a sizeable body of opinion favouring the Western way of life might well deter the U.S.S.R. from launching mass attacks against the West.

(b) It should be made clear to the satellite countries that Canada recognizes their individual identities and is interested in seeing these identities preserved, and to this end the programmes should attempt to keep alive their hopes for independence as free nations.

(c) International broadcasts such as those of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Overseas Service of the B.B.C. and the Voice of America, are the only means available to most of the nationals of the satellite countries to learn the truth not only about their relations with Russia but about political developments within their own countries. Consequently, every effort should be made not only to give factual international news to listeners in these countries but also dispassionate accounts of local happenings within the countries concerned together with detached appraisals and political commentaries thereon.

(d) There is some evidence that the C.B.C. International Service has built up fairly large audiences in several satellite countries, particularly Czechoslovakia. A conscious effort should be made to attract additional listeners by designing programmes which are likely to be of interest to people in all walks of life.

Programmes to Western Europe

11. The Committee believes that the programmes broadcast to Europe (including U.K.) in English and French accomplish relatively little in the promotion of Canadian interest. On the other hand, it does not believe they can be eliminated entirely, if any broadcasting is to be done. It is recommended that these two programmes be reduced to forty minutes daily each, with occasional additional time for a special programme when warranted by purpose and quality. It is also recommended that the budget for this part of the service be substantially reduced and that the C.B.C. explore the possibility of using more of the content of suitable domestic programmes for re-broadcast on shortwave.

12. It is realized that at present the programme work for this English and French service frequently is the basis for other language services. The Committee believes that the priority recommended for the Russian and satellite services should carry with it additional resources, if needed, to enable the programming to be suited to the specialized purposes of these services.

13. The Committee has come to the conclusion that the Italian, Dutch and Scandinavian services should be curtailed substantially, as it is not felt that the rather general and intangible purposes to be served warrant the scale of expenditure involved in the present programme schedules. It is believed that the number of listeners to these programmes is small and there is some doubt that Canadian short-wave broadcasting can, in any significant degree, affect national policy or public opinion in these countries. We can, it is true, convince some of the relatively small minority of the people in these countries who listen to shortwave rather than standard broadcasts, that Canada is a better and more cultured country than they would otherwise believe it to be, but the cost of doing so is out of proportion to the value gained. It is true, too, that shortwave broadcasting to Holland in particular has helped to sustain the special friendliness between the Dutch people and Canada that developed at the end of the war, but that friendliness can, and perhaps should, be fostered in other less expensive and more effective ways. One effective way of achieving this end is to increase, if possible, the number of C.B.C. relays over local stations in Western Europe since a much larger audience can be reached in this way than is possible by direct shortwave broadcasts. As to the latter form of broadcasting, it is recommended that the present daily programmes be replaced by two half-hour broadcasts, one on Saturdays and the other on Sundays, to Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Holland and Italy and that the Finnish service be discontinued entirely.

14. This week-end plan for Western Europe has several advantages. It provides a continuous schedule at a set time and day which can be announced. Broadcasting will be confined to Saturdays and Sundays when the listening audience is normally larger than during the rest of the week. This plan also holds the not inconsiderable advantage of permitting the reallocation of more favourable week-day listening periods to the all-important service to the satellite countries. In addition, more time would be allowed for the preparation of the broadcasts which can be recorded in advance. As two staff members would be needed for the preparation of relay material in any event, the direct weekend broadcasts can be added at little additional cost. It is suggested that, for the most part, the week-end broadcasts consist of projection of Canada material with little news content.

The Ukrainian Service

15. The Committee recognizes the special reasons that led to the establishment of the Ukrainian service. It feels, however, that if and when other services are to be discontinued, a critical appraisal of this service is warranted. Such a review leads to the conclusion that the service is not worth what it costs and its character is inconsistent with what seems to be the sensible policy in broadcasting to the U.S.S.R.

16. The Committee believes the Ukrainian service should be discontinued concurrently with the curtailment of the programmes to Western Europe and the discontinuance of the Finnish service. It is hoped that the occasion of a general revision of policy and operations would permit the discontinuance of this service without engendering an intolerable reaction from Ukrainian groups in Canada. If this recommendation is concurred in by the government, any criticism that might ensue could be countered by pointing out that discontinuance of the Ukrainian service is part of a general programme designed both to reduce the overall costs of the International Service and to improve the quality and quantity of those services which are to be retained, that as a matter of policy the Canadian government treats the Ukraine as part of the Soviet Union and not as a separate political entity as in the case of Czechoslovakia and Poland, and that, because of Soviet jamming and for other reasons, it is reasonable to conclude that the C.B.C. is probably not getting through to Ukrainian listeners with anything approaching the regularity and clarity of the programmes beamed to the satellite countries.

17. Attached hereto as Appendix "A" is a list showing both the present and proposed time schedules for Eastern and Western Europe.†

The Latin American Services

18. The Committee has found it hard to judge the effectiveness of the Latin American services from the mixed reports it has received. There is probably more place for shortwave broadcasting, and for honest news from outside, than in Western Europe, even though many people cannot afford shortwave sets and the local taste in entertainment is for something rather lighter than the serious fare we provide. On the other hand, the value to the average Canadian of goodwill and the "projection of Canada" in Latin America is remote and the value to commercial relations is negligible. Nevertheless, the termination of this service to the sensitive Latin Americans would be an affront, and some, even nominal, appearance of a desire to cultivate friendly relations would probably be of general political value. This is enhanced by the fact that the U.S.A. has cut out its service to Latin America.

19. The Committee has therefore come to the conclusion that the service to Latin America — in Spanish, Portuguese, French and English — should be continued on a reduced scale. This will not take transmitter time that would be of any value for the service to areas behind the Curtain. The Committee suggests that the C.B.C. recognize the limited purposes of these broadcasts and endeavour normally to make them relatively light and inexpensive, with an occasional longer and more serious programme thrown in — perhaps even weekly — after some careful research into the potential audience and its tastes. More use too might be made of local broadcasting of transcribed programmes. Account should also be taken of seasonal variation in reception conditions in deciding upon special additional programmes. The Committee believes that it should be possible to secure a significant saving in the cost of the Latin American service on this basis.

20. Attached hereto as Appendix "B" is a list showing the present and proposed Latin American time schedules.†

Quality of Reception

21. The Committee has been disturbed by some of the reports from officers abroad concerning the difficulty encountered in various countries in getting adequate reception of the C.B.C. shortwave broadcasts. This problem will be less important if the Western European services are reduced, as suggested, but it will remain in respect of areas behind the Curtain and in Latin America. The Committee suggests that diplomatic officers behind the Curtain should have shortwave sets which can be used to test periodically the quality of the reception it is possible to obtain not only in the capital area, but in other areas as well. From their periodic reports based on this, and other sources they should explore, we should judge whether or not reception conditions warrant the continuation of this expensive venture in foreign policy.

22. In Latin America, it is suggested more effort be made by the C.B.C. itself to assess both reception conditions and the nature and tastes of local shortwave listeners through periodic visits by a competent specialized officer, supplemented by assistance from the permanent diplomatic and trade missions. Perhaps occasionally in the major potential listening areas it would be worthwhile to go to the expense of getting a sample poll taken of listening habits in their relation to the C.B.C. programmes. If in future these showed the number of listeners to be negligible, this could be used publicly as an understandable reason for discontinuing the service without any suggestion of disregard for Latin America.

Budgets and Reports

23. It is difficult in advance to say how much it would cost to operate efficiently the service on the reduced basis suggested above. However, after careful review of the international service budget by representatives of the C.B.C. and of the Department of Finance, the Corporation has agreed that the reduced service outlined above can be operated at an annual cost (taking into account the recovery of the Armed Forces and Northwest Territories broadcasts referred to below) of approximately $1.5 million. Such a budget would accomplish a saving of approximately $450,000 as compared with expenditures in 1953-54 and of more than $650,000 as compared with the estimates for 1954-55. A comparative budget breakdown showing how this can be achieved is attached as Appendix "C".†

24. It is suggested that if the government approves these general proposals, they should be announced to Parliament, then put into effect as soon as possible after July 1st, 1954, and a careful watch kept during the next twelve or eighteen months over the level of expenditures necessary to carry out the revised service.

25. An interim review of progress should be made for setting the 1955-56 estimates, and a final review for setting the 1956-57 estimates.

26. It is also suggested that the costs of the service to the Northwest Territories should not be borne on the appropriations of the International Service, to which they do not relate notwithstanding the use of the Sackville transmitter, but that the domestic service of the C.B.C. should bear the cost of this service, including a proper share of overheads.

27. Similarly, the International Service vote should not bear the cost of the special service to the Canadian forces in Europe and Korea. This should properly be charged to the Defence budget.

28. It is suggested that this Committee of officials should receive and review for consideration of the Cabinet Committee reports to be made each six months by the C.B.C. and the Department of External Affairs on the operations and policies of the International Service. The Committee believes it highly desirable that a close contact be preserved in future between the activity of this service and the general views of the government in regard to it. It is also desirable that when the policy is now reviewed and re-established, there should be a period of reasonable stability in the operation before new major changes are made.

29. The Committee finally wishes to draw attention to the fact that the reduced broadcasting schedule set out above will entail a reduction in the staff of the International Service of approximately fifty persons, many of whom have been with the C.B.C.-IS since 1946. Some of these can be absorbed into the other services of the C.B.C., but others, because of their language specialties, cannot be employed in any other form of broadcasting.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION; INTERNATIONAL BROADCASTING POLICY; REPORT OF CABINET COMMITTEE

10. Dr. McCann referred to discussion at the meeting of January 7th, 1954, when it was agreed that a special Cabinet Committee be established to review the purposes, operations and accomplishments of the International Service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to submit recommendations to the government as to future policy concerning this service.

After examining some of the more important aspects of the problem, the Cabinet Committee had requested a special committee of officials to make a detailed study of the Service and to submit a report as to the best means by which economies could be made. On May 25th, the committee of officials had submitted to the Cabinet Committee a detailed report setting out various recommendations, the more important of which were,

(a) That the C.B.C.-I.S. programmes to Russia and to the satellite countries be increased somewhat;

(b) that the Ukrainian and Finnish services be discontinued immediately;

(c) that the English and French programmes to western Europe, including those to the United Kingdom, be substantially reduced;

(d) that the Swedish, Norwegian, Danish, Dutch and Italian programmes be broadcast, henceforth, on a so-called "week-end" plan which would involve replacing the current daily programmes to those countries by a 30-minute period, on Saturdays and Sundays only;

(e) that the Latin-American programmes be curtailed and made lighter and less expensive in character; and,

(f) that the costs of the Northwest Territories services be borne by the domestic service of the C.B.C., and the costs of the special programmes for Canadian Forces abroad by the Department of National Defence.

If these recommendations were approved, it was estimated that a saving of approximately $650,000 might be made as compared with the estimates for 1954-55. It was further pointed out that contraction of services on this scale would entail a reduction in the staff of the International Service of the C.B.C. of approximately 50 persons.

Members of the Special Cabinet Committee had generally been inclined to endorse the recommendations submitted by the committee of officials but were rather concerned as to the domestic implications of completely discontinuing the Ukrainian service.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Secretary's memorandum, May 26, 1954, and attached report — Cab. Doc. 137-54).

11. In the course of discussion the following points emerged:

(a) As discontinuance of the Ukrainian service would only account for approximately $50,000 out of a total estimated saving of $650,000, it might be preferable to defer decision on this particular recommendation since its implementation would undoubtedly give rise to much criticism on the part of the numerous Ukrainian communities in Canada.

(b) It seemed clear that the value of the International Service from the immigration and trade promotion point of view was negligible. Nonetheless, the reduced service recommended by the committee of officials appeared to provide the minimum nucleus required to ensure that the personnel, transmitting facilities and short-wave channels remained available for use on an expanded scale in an emergency.

12. The Cabinet noted the report by the Chairman of the special Cabinet Committee on International Broadcasting Policy and,

(a) agreed that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation be instructed to implement, shortly, but without publicity, the recommendations of the special committee of officials as set out in their report of May 22nd, 1954, except those relating to the Ukrainian service;

(b) deferred decision on the proposed discontinuance of the Ukrainian service pending further consideration at some later date;

(c) agreed that no announcement be made at this time concerning the proposed reduction in the programme schedule of the C.B.C. International Service; and,

(d) agreed that, if questions were raised in the House regarding this matter, Dr. McCann should merely state that the operations of the International Service were currently being reviewed by the government, and it was hoped that some reduction could soon be made in the present level of expenditures.

ARAB-ISRAELI RELATIONS

In recent weeks we have been reviewing events in the Middle East to see whether there has been any improvement in the relations between Israel and its Arab neighbours. You may have seen the suggestions in the press that tension in the area was slowly decreasing and that there were glimmers of hope that in time the states concerned would reach some reasonably permanent settlement of their differences. As you are aware, Arab-Israeli relations are complex and our information about the happenings in the area is not always free from bias and doubt. We hope that in time this situation will be remedied by the reporting from our new missions in the Middle East. Meanwhile, any assessment must be hedged with reservations. This memorandum summarizes the conclusions of a more lengthy analysis of recent developments which may be of interest to you and which I have attached.

2. Incidents along the lines of demarcation between Israel and its neighbours have continued but the intensity of the border strife has declined. The truce supervision machinery has been overhauled and improved and is now operating effectively and with a high degree of cooperation from all the parties. General Burns appears to have established himself as an impartial judge of the manifold disputes arising between the states concerned. His initiative in trying to increase the effectiveness of the truce observation teams has been welcomed by the United Nations Secretariat, by the press and by officials of governments interested in but not directly connected with the Palestine dispute. You will have seen Sir Anthony Eden's tribute to General Burns.

3. The refugee problem continues to be an underlying cause of Arab dissatisfaction. Recently Israel made an important offer concerning the release of blocked accounts and the compensation of dispossessed Palestinian Arabs which may appease refugee sentiment to a considerable extent. The Government of Jordan has disavowed the negotiations which the Israelis claim to have held with representatives of the refugees about the release of blocked bank balances and the outcome is yet to be determined. The new Jordanian Government contains strong elements from the "west bank", that is, from the territory which was formerly within the Palestine Mandate. This probably accounts to a large extent for Jordan's obduracy in its recent dealings with Israel. If Israel were to add to its announced concessions to refugees an offer to repatriate a token number of them, the Arabs' sense of injury on this score might be allayed.

4. To secure peace the Government of Israel may be prepared to make further concessions, even including minor alterations along the frontiers and some form of international control of the Holy Places. A corridor across the Negeb desert and access to and the use of the port facilities of Haifa, both of which the Israelis have already offered, should appeal to the trade-conscious Arabs. In return the Israelis would reasonably expect a final peace settlement, not too rigidly based upon the various United Nations resolutions and particularly those adopted before May 1948, and a consequent lifting of the Arab blockade. If comparative quiet could be maintained along the demarcation lines for six months or so, the present Arab leaders, most of whom are privately persuaded that Israel has come to stay, might be induced to promote the idea among their people and eventually to negotiate a modus vivendi with Israel. The chief obstacles to this development are (a) the barrier of hatred which the Arab Governments have allowed to be raised in Arab public opinion and which the aggressive and retaliatory acts of Israel have strengthened, and (b) the self-delusion which the Arabs have practised about their ability to crush the new state of Israel. In addition Israeli cries of protest and anger have frequently been overdone, increasing Arab suspicion about Israel's real intentions.

5. To create the atmosphere for Arab-Israeli negotiations the Western Great Powers may be required to reaffirm their determination to maintain the territorial status quo in Palestine. Both sides are anxious to be reassured on this score. It seems that something more positive than the Tripartite Statement of May 25, 1950⁴⁷ is needed. This need has become greater in recent months as a consequence of the United States decision to supply arms to the Arab states, notably to Iraq and Egypt, and of the United Kingdom withdrawal from the Suez Canal Zone. These two developments, combined with the successful outcome of the negotiations in Tehran, have undoubtedly paved the way for better relations between the Muslim states of the Middle East and the Western democracies but they have produced in Israel a sense of isolation, particularly since the Soviet Union has begun to woo the Arabs at the expense of Israel.

6. The arming of the Arabs against communism may well be more complicated than the proponents of the "Northern Tier Concept" care to admit. Because of the political instability in the countries concerned, their preoccupation with local problems, their distrust of foreigners and particularly those from the West, and the urgent need for economic development which is so much hampered by the crushing burden of defence expenditure, the "lining up" of the Arabs is fraught with risks not only for the Western cause but for the peace of the Middle East. It would be gravely misleading to conclude that the attainment of peace and stability in the area is merely a question of time. The danger of renewed hostilities is never far removed. It lies not so much in the intentions of the governments concerned as in an accidental outburst or an adventure embarked upon for political opportunity. Accordingly, there is some basis for the Israeli fear that the arms given to the Arabs to fight communism might ultimately be turned against Israel.

7. In these circumstances the control of the supply of arms to the Middle East, a control which has become dangerously lax in the last year, is in need of repair. It is clear from recent reports on the export of arms to Israel that the United States, the United Kingdom and France do not always agree on the quality and quantity of arms which should be shipped to Middle East countries. This failure to cooperate, combined with the fact that the countries in the area can and do obtain arms from still other sources, makes it practically impossible to maintain the so-called equilibrium in military power in the Middle East and merely adds to the "crisis of confidence" in Arab-Israeli relations.

8. Canada has been concerned primarily with Israeli requests for arms. The available evidence indicates that during the past year Israel may have been stockpiling beyond its ordinary needs for defence and internal security. This stockpiling could mean that

(a) The Israelis fear that time is on the side of the Arabs, that the latter will ultimately attack Israel, that therefore Israel must strike soon to achieve the military objectives which would compel the Arabs to make peace; or

(b) The Israelis do not fear an attack from the Arabs under present leadership but they do see a real possibility that Arab extremists may gain the upper hand and launch a new war; therefore Israel must be strong enough to ward off such an attack and "strong enough" must be assessed in the context of the proposed arming of the Arabs against communism.

On the basis of the information now available to the Department, (b) would appear to be the safer assessment. A third possibility that Israel has expansionist designs on territory beyond the present demarcation lines seems most unlikely in the present circumstances.

9. The assessment stated in the preceding paragraph does not imply necessarily that Israel's "fear complex" is well-founded or that Israel should be encouraged in it. The danger of over-arming one side, and thus tipping the balance of military power in the Middle East, is perhaps more real today than it was in 1948, because the scale at which arms are being supplied to the area is vastly increased. If our interpretation of recent developments is correct, the time may be ripe and the need is pressing for the Western Great Powers to re-examine closely in a coordinated way the entire field of Arab-Israeli relations with a view not only of bringing the supply of arms under control but of bringing the parties to the Palestine dispute to the conference table. The West's new-found friendship with the Arab states could be used not to encourage them in their bitterness against Israel but to sell them on the benefits which would accrue to all concerned, if a practicable solution could be found to the problems existing between the Arab states and Israel. There have been no clear indications that those powers are contemplating any comprehensive action to achieve those ends; nor have we any precise ideas on how such action might be initiated. What is clearly called for, however, is some positive step to create confidence on both sides in the Middle East, and a re-affirmation in more exact terms of the Tripartite Statement of 1950 would probably be a useful point of departure.⁴⁸

During the past year, and particularly during recent months, the Department has had to consider an increasing number of requests for the sale of arms to countries in the Middle East. These requests have increased in size and in importance and, from consultations with United States and United Kingdom officials, it is clear that the requests to Canada reflect a substantial increase in the arms exported into the Middle East from Western sources. The situation calls for a re-assessment of Arab-Israeli relations to see (a) whether tension in the area is slackening; (b) what has prompted the increase in the sale of arms to Middle East countries; and (c) what impact the present influx of arms is likely to have in the area. The subject matter is complex and the sources of information are not free from bias and doubt. The assessment must, therefore, be hedged with reservations.

Outbreaks of Violence

2. If violence along the borders of Israel were the sole criterion for determining whether relations had improved, there would not be too much room for optimism. At the beginning of July occurred a sudden and violent outburst between Israelis and Jordanians face to face in Jerusalem; the exact cause of this disturbance has not been determined. In September the Israelis were condemned by the Israel-Jordan Mixed Armistice Commission "in the strongest terms for this latest aggression", that is, the well-armed and well-organized raid by Israeli forces on the village of Beit Liqya, three miles inside Jordan. On October 2 the Israel-Egypt Mixed Armistice Commission, noting the deterioration on the situation along the frontier between these countries, condemned Egypt and called upon the Egyptian authorities "immediately and finally" to put an end to acts of aggression against Israel. There have been other sporadic but relentless killings, thefts, gun-fire, rustling and marauding along the demarcation lines. The infiltration from the Gaza Strip (Egyptian territory) has been particularly vicious and apparently is aimed at disrupting Israeli efforts to develop the Negeb desert. Israeli retaliatory raids, designed to "punish" the areas from which the infiltrators come, were deplored by General Burns in his report of September 7 to the Secretary General of the United Nations.

3. Taken by themselves these incidents are grave enough and if allowed to get out of hand they could, as General Burns has pointed out, lead to a renewal of general hostilities between the countries concerned. In the context of the bloody Qibya raid on Jordan territory in October 1953 and the consequent massacres at Scorpion Pass and Nahalin in March 1954, the most recent outbreaks are relatively tame. United Kingdom observers, who at one time feared that a major incident might occur during the annual manoeuvres of the Israeli Army which took place in September, were relieved to find that in fact the manoeuvres this year were on a relatively small scale, with fewer reservists called up than in previous years, and were conducted in comparative quiet. A significant difference too was that, following the grave disorders about the beginning of 1954, the Security Council took a renewed interest in the Palestine question, strengthened the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization and intensified the search for more effective methods for implementing the Armistice Agreements.

Attitude of the Parties

4. Another discouraging factor has been the ceaseless campaign of vilification which each side has waged against the other. In the general debate at the present session of the General Assembly the Israeli representative and his Arab counterparts made charges and countercharges along the usual lines. Each side professed peaceful intentions and blamed the other for aggression. The Arabs clung to the General Assembly resolutions, the Israelis to the Armistice Agreements. Perhaps the opposing positions have become too doctrinaire to permit an about-face in public.

5. Yet even in the midst of the hot words exchanged, and the representative of Iraq was so intemperate that the President of the Assembly considered it necessary to reproach him, there were indications that the situation was not hopeless:

(a) The representative of Syria suggested that the deadlock on the Palestine question could be solved by the establishment of a Palestine Commission, consisting of the five permanent members of the Security Council, with wide powers to give effect to the resolutions of the General Assembly. Although this proposal was dismissed as "frivolous" by the Israeli representative and although it apparently did not have the endorsement of the other Arab members, the fact that it was presented and the relatively mild tone of the Syrian statement illustrated that not all the Arabs were bent upon the destruction of Israel. The Syrian position may have been taken because Syria had merely a care-taker government; it may also have perturbed some of the extremists in the Arab camp. However, it could exemplify some Arab resignation, in keeping with what we believe to be the private views of the more enlightened Arabs, about the fact that Israel has come to stay.

(b) The Israeli representative, declaring that there was a deep crisis of confidence between Israel and its neighbours, suggested that the only conceivable way of allaying such fears would be the conclusion of peace treaties, placing Arab-Israeli relations on a permanently normal footing, but as a preliminary or transitory stage to that end it might be useful to conclude agreements committing the parties to policies of non-aggression and the pacific settlement of disputes. The Egyptian representative, speaking immediately after the Israeli, stated that "the professed peaceful intentions of Israel cannot be regarded as valid even for a moment". He maintained that Israel was trying to delude the whole world as to its expansionist designs and was stirring up doubt about the true peaceful intentions of the Arab countries. The Egyptian statement has been generally regarded in the press as an immediate rebuff to the Israeli offer. It is by no means clear that the statement was so intended, particularly because the Egyptian representative did not deal categorically with the Israeli "peace proposal". This leaves slight room for hope that the Arabs might in time be prepared to consider the Israeli suggestion, or something like it.

The Refugee Problem

6. Clearly the unresolved problem of Palestine refugees looms large in the minds of the Arab political leaders. The representatives of Egypt and Iraq underlined it in their recent statements to the General Assembly. The refugees exert strong political pressure on the government of the countries in which they have resettled; they provide a fertile field for exploitation by political opportunists; they also play a large part in the infiltration across the demarcation lines. Uprooted from their traditional environment, unwanted in the new lands for international and domestic political reasons, and a constant drain on the economies of the Arab countries concerned, the Palestinian refugees pose what is perhaps the fundamental and certainly one of the most difficult problems in Arab-Israeli relations.

7. At the end of September the Government of Israel took an important step to conciliate the refugees and their Arab advocates. In continuation of its discussions with the Conciliation Commission for Palestine, Israel announced that it would release to absentee or refugee owners all outstanding bank balances in Israel, together with articles deposited for safe custody and the contents of safety deposit boxes at present vested with the Israeli Custodian of Absentee Property. The total amount of the blocked accounts was about $8,500,000 of which one-third had been released earlier by the Israeli authorities. The Government of Jordan has disavowed the negotiations which the Israelis claim to have held with representatives of the refugees about the release of blocked bank balances and the outcome is yet to be determined. The new Jordanian Government contains strong elements from the "west bank" territory which was formerly within the Palestine Mandate. This probably accounts to a large extent for Jordan's obdurateness in its recent dealings with Israel.

8. About the same time, in an interview broadcast in Arabic, the Israeli Foreign Ministry stated that Israel was resolved to start a practical scheme of paying compensation to the Palestine refugees; that the Israeli Government believed that a practical plan could be found for interregional communication across the Negeb desert; and that Israel was ready to grant to Jordan facilities in Haifa harbour and transit rights for goods through Israeli territory. These conciliatory steps, believed to have been taken by the Israeli Government to ease the tension in Palestine, were given full publicity in the Arab press and although they have been the subject of Arab criticism, have been described by some Western observers as the most significant development in many months.

Truce Supervision

9. There has been an improvement in the relations between the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization and the parties. The prestige of the observer group and of the Chief of Staff has been restored. When General Burns entered upon the scene, the Israelis were not co-operating with the Mixed Armistice Commission for Israel and Jordan, largely because of their antipathy toward Commander Elmo Hutchison of the United States Navy, who in March had abstained in the voting on an Israeli resolution condemning Jordan for the ambush of an Israeli bus at Scorpion Pass; there was a backlog of cases to be dealt with by the appeals board set up by U.N.T.S.O.; and the observers had been denied entry into areas controlled by Israel unless accompanied by an Israeli conducting officer. At the present time the Israelis are cooperating with the Mixed Armistice Commission; the appeals board has begun to function again; the Israelis and General Burns have devised, not without an argument about the function and powers of U.N.T.S.O., a practicable method for facilitating investigations by observer groups. The impression is that the truce supervision machinery is running much more smoothly and that General Burns has the confidence of both sides, notwithstanding his differences with the Israelis. Since he arrived in Palestine under a cloud of Arab suspicion, these differences have probably served to persuade the Arabs that General Burns will be impartial.

10. In addition, military commanders on both sides have exercised restraint. The Arab Legion has been held in check, in large measure owing to the presence of British officers. The senior commanders of the Israeli Army have shown themselves willing to listen to reason. Many of the incidents probably result from hot-headedness among the militia and para-military forces which man the borders and from the nervousness of the armed civilians on both sides. Some may arise because the wandering Bedouins innocently or stubbornly refuse to give up their traditional ways in spite of the newly established frontiers. Other incidents, particularly those in Jerusalem and along the Gaza Strip, may well be the work of professional terrorists. There have been unconfirmed suggestions, for example, that the Muslim Brotherhood has played a part in these activities and that the incursions from Egypt bear the marks of training by ex-German army instructors, who if Nazis might relish the prospect of testing their techniques and their trainees against the Israeli inhabitants. The real possibility that these influences are at work illustrates the difficulties to be overcome not only by U.N.T.S.O. but by the local authorities in the countries concerned.

Domestic Politics

11. No analysis of Arab-Israeli relations would be complete without some reference to domestic politics, for these in large part dictate the external policies of the governments concerned. The rising Arab nationalism and the bitter resentment of the very existence of Israel have created an awkward situation for Arab political leaders, even the more moderate ones. The dispute with Israel is one topic on which it is very difficult to get any Arab to listen to advice or even to talk rationally. Even those leaders who confess privately that their rigidly negative attitude towards the Jews is a mistake cannot persuade any substantial body of local opinion that Israel has come to stay, and indeed hardly dare try to do so. As long as the widespread hatred and fear of Israel prevails in the Arab countries, it will not be possible for the governments concerned to parley with Israel, however shortsighted and stultifying this attitude may appear to the enlightened elements. What is needed is a lengthy period of quiet along the frontiers, to allow time for some relaxation of tension and for an inclination to peace to develop. If the Israelis could follow up their recent offer of concessions with restraint as regards armed excursions in retaliation against the infiltration into Israel, there is some hope that the atmosphere for peace can be brought about.

12. On the Israeli side the Government has also to deal with a roused public sentiment. Because of their successes in 1948, the Israeli militarists and other extreme nationalists see no reason why the present impasse cannot be solved by force. The economy of Israel, relying on the one hand on financial assistance from outside and crippled on the other by the Arab blockade and by the costs of defence, demands that an early solution be reached of the dispute with the Arabs. There is the lingering fear, heightened by irresponsible Arab statements, that the Arabs are merely gathering their strength for another attempt to crush Israel. A constant irritant too is the infiltration into Israel which frequently results in a loss of Israeli life and almost always in a loss of Israeli property. Faced with the urgent problem of placing the country on a sounder economic footing and with the pressure of a population which has expanded too rapidly through immigration, impatient and energetic Israelis are pressing for action by their Government which will compel the Arabs to make peace. The wonder is that the moderate elements, represented by Mr. Sharett, have been able to avoid the temptation of appeasing this rampant nationalism. Incidents like the massacre at Qibya and the more recent attack on Beit Liqya, suggest that from time to time the pressure for decisive action cannot be restrained; yet the folly of these punitive raids is that, far from deterring infiltration, they increase the hatred and thirst for revenge, setting up a chain reaction which could easily get out of hand.

Export of Arms to the Middle East

13. In recent months the Israelis have intensified their efforts to procure arms, particularly from the Western democracies. Their declared object is to refurbish the fighting equipment of the Israeli forces. The net effect of these purchases has been to increase greatly the military strength of Israel. The important question to be decided by the supplying countries is whether this Israeli quest for arms is born of a fear of an Arab attack or is indicative of an Israeli intention to seek a solution by force of the deadlock in Palestine. The weapons which the Israelis have been seeking — jet aircraft, tanks, aerial bombs and increased artillery — seem well beyond their needs for defence against the Arabs, in the present disorganized state of the latter. The best available evidence indicates that Israel could now defend itself against any attack the Arabs could mount. Moreover, the weapons in demand are not those normally used for punitive raids (assuming one could find justification for the retaliatory raids carried out by Israeli forces). This circumstantial evidence could mean, therefore, that the Israelis are contemplating large-scale operations.

14. On the other hand, the recent Israel efforts to obtain more arms have coincided with an intensive propaganda campaign by the Israeli Government and by Zionist organizations to persuade the world that Israel's future has been placed in jeopardy by the decision of the Western Powers to arm the Arabs against communism. The Israelis have expressed anxiety about the Turco-Pakistan Treaty, the United States agreement with Iraq on military aid and the United Kingdom agreement with Egypt about the Suez Canal Base. The latter agreement results, of course, in the lifting of the arms embargo in respect of Egypt and, taken with the others, could presage a preponderant increase in the arms to be shipped to the Arab states. The recent developments in the Middle East in the direction of closer cooperation between the Muslim states and the Western democracies have produced in Israel a sense of isolation, particularly since the Soviet Union has begun to woo the Arabs at the expense of Israel. In these circumstances and before the Arabs actually get their hands on the new weapons, the Israelis may well consider that they must now look to their own defences, if Israel is to survive.

15. A United Kingdom estimate in 1953 of Israel's military strength on full mobilization, which estimate was based on the assumption that Israel could receive substantial supplies of equipment from outside, was that the Israel Army could be expected to fight intelligently and tenaciously in defence of Israeli territory. Reliable observers believe that in any future struggle with the Arabs the superior efficiency, skill and organization of the Israel Air Force might well turn the balance. As in the case of the ground forces, the morale and fighting capacity of the Air Force would likely be higher in defence than in attack. Whether Israel would continue to be capable, as in 1948, of strongly repelling a combined assault by the armies of Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria is an open question. Like Israel, the Arab countries have been strengthened militarily since 1948 and, if the proposed United States programme is carried out, they will receive additional aid, enabling them to expand and improve their fighting services. Nevertheless, the outcome of any new Palestine war would probably still depend on the amount of coordination and tenacity displayed by the larger Arab forces.

16. The Israelis have recently become alarmed at what they consider a change of attitude by the United States and the United Kingdom, but more particularly the former. In public statements Mr. Sharett has emphasized that Israel is fully aware that the Western powers are sincerely anxious to avoid "a new regional conflagration" and that their policies in the Middle East are by no means rooted in a deliberate design to injure Israel. The Israeli anxiety, however, is born of the conviction that by strengthening the Arabs, ostensibly to fill a power vacuum in the cold war, the Western Great Powers are dangerously encouraging countries to maintain "an illegal state of belligerence" against Israel and to refuse to make peace with it. In short, the Israelis fear that the arms supplied to fight communism will be turned at the propitious time against Israel. This fear underlies Israel's outspoken opposition to the Turco-Pakistan Treaty, the United States arms agreement with Iraq and the United Kingdom withdrawal from the Suez.

17. This Israeli fear has prima facie basis, because the Arab Governments have steadfastly refused to forsake publicly their previously avowed animosity toward Israel. (Last week, the King of Jordan declared that his Government's policy on Palestine was one of "no peace, no negotiations with Israel" and full support for the rights of Arab refugees.) It seems that in the negotiations with the United States about arms the Arab Governments have been reluctant for domestic political reasons to give openly assurances that the arms will not be used against Israel. For similar political reasons the Arab states have been slow to enter into formal agreements which would bind them closer to the West. Some leaders, like Nuri Said Pasha in Iraq, have expressed a desire to strengthen these ties but said they must hold back for fear of offending their own people or Arab neighbours who view with distrust any closer alignment with the West. Colonel Nasser is said to be privately in favour of a closer knit defence organization in the Middle East which would be associated with the West but apparently he too is unable at this time to carry Egyptian public opinion with him. Thus, if there were now to be any large-scale arming of the Arabs, there would be an inherent risk that peace within the area might be disturbed, especially if the extremists were to gain control in the Arab countries.

18. Officials in the United Kingdom and the United States concerned with the export of arms to the Middle East have emphatically asserted that there has been no change of policy. The primary objective has remained to maintain a balance of power as between Israel and its Arab neighbours. United States officials have pointed out that the arms agreement with Iraq and the proposed agreement with Egypt (on which little headway has been made) involves only a moderate programme of military assistance. They say that reports in the press on United States intentions with respect to the Arab states are completely out of balance. They are alarmed at the extent to which United States policy in the Middle East was made an issue in the Congressional elections, the results of which could mean a new swing in favour of Israel. These United States officials have clearly been suspicious of Israeli intentions. Although the United Kingdom officials do not say that Israeli motives are sinister, they are obviously worried by the recent build-up in the military strength of Israel. They are particularly anxious about a French decision, apparently taken independently of the United Kingdom and United States, to sell Mystère jet aircraft to Israel. The United Kingdom has, nevertheless, been selling some second-line jet aircraft and tanks to Egypt and Israel. It is clear from recent reports that the joint control of arms exports to the Middle East, ostensibly in implementation of the Tripartite Statement, leaves something to be desired.

19. Notwithstanding the continuing public denunciation and the perennial Arab threats, there seems little likelihood that the Arab states contemplate any new attack on Israel. Rivalry, jealousy and intrigue continue to bedevil the attempts at collective action by the Arabs. None of these states is strong enough yet to wage a separate war against Israel. All of them suffer acute political instability and economic depression. Lebanon, Iraq and Syria would probably treat with Israel, if they thought Egypt would follow suit. Jordan might be dragged or pushed into line. Egypt holds the key to peace in Palestine and the real hope lies in Colonel Nasser's ability to gain and keep the support of the volatile Egyptian public. He can only achieve this end by building on a solid foundation of economic and social reform.

If he found the going too tough, he might be tempted to embark on a nationalistic adventure, such as the persecution of Jews in Egypt, which only very indirectly might lead to a war with Israel. To date he has kept control by beating one scape-goat but with the departure of the United Kingdom troops he and the Council of the Revolutionary Command will have to face their domestic responsibilities squarely. The recent crack-down on the Muslim Brotherhood is a step in the right direction for although it will embitter the enemies of the régime, it will shake the foundation of extremist opposition. If this stamping out of dangerous and irresponsible political opponents is accompanied by a real improvement in the economic and social fields, the Nasser régime might yet give Egypt its long-awaited stability. If Nasser were to be eliminated, however, the prospects for stability in Egypt and for peace in the Middle East might be gloomy indeed. The Israeli authorities know all this and the encouraging signs fail to relieve their anxiety, perhaps because they see all around them the instability and latent extremism which provide an explosive atmosphere for political adventure.

20. The Tripartite Statement of May 25, 1950, made by the United Kingdom, the United States and France, was designed to bring about a relaxation of tension in the Middle East and a consequent falling off in the quantities of arms purchased by countries in the area. Although the Western Great Powers were anxious to avoid an arms race in the Middle East, they recognized the need of the Arab states and Israel to maintain their armed forces at a sufficient level for internal security and legitimate self-defence and to permit them to play their part in the defence of the area as a whole. The purchasing states had given assurances that they did not intend to undertake any active aggression against any other state. Under the terms of the Statement, if those states were found to be preparing to violate frontiers or armistice lines, the United Kingdom, United States and France would immediately take action both within and outside the United Nations "to prevent such violation". The operative sections of the Statement are somewhat vague and, in the light of developments in the area since May 1950, there seems to be a growing need for a clarification of what action might be taken by the Western Great Powers to prevent the violations to which the Tripartite Statement referred.

Diplomatic Activity

21. It is because of the "crisis of confidence" in the Middle East that both sides have been pressing the Western Great Powers for firmer guarantees concerning their security. Each side needs to be reassured about and reinsured against the intentions of the other. In a joint approach in London on September 17 the Arab representatives urged that "urgent measures" be taken to deter Israel from any "further aggression" and asked that immediate assistance be given to the Arab states in order to strengthen them economically and militarily. A non-committal reply was given by the United Kingdom on September 21 because the Arab initiative was first regarded as little more than a counter to the Israeli campaign against the granting of undue assistance to the Arabs. Later when the Foreign Office had digested the Arab statement and the friendly and encouraging remarks of the Prime Minister of Iraq during his recent visit to London, the United Kingdom officials began wondering whether the time might not be ripe to persuade the Arabs to make some gesture, however small, which would contribute to the easing of Arab-Israeli relations. The United Kingdom officials have in mind a collective or separate public assurance by the Arabs along the line of the Tripartite Statement of May 25, 1950. United States and French authorities have been consulted on whether the Arabs should be approached on this matter.

22. For their part, the Israelis have sought formal assurances from the United Kingdom that the Arab states will not be allowed to acquire a marked superiority in arms over Israel. The Israelis have also inquired in what circumstances the United Kingdom would intervene on Israel's behalf in the event of an Arab attack. The Israelis have in mind the treaty obligations which exist between the United Kingdom and some of the Arab states. The Israeli Note was couched in the context of the Anglo-Egyptian Agreement on the Suez Canal Base, which Agreement in the Israeli view had unfortunate shortcomings that left Israel in an exposed position. The United Kingdom reply did not go much beyond the Tripartite Statement but did express gratification about the absence of serious incidents in the last few weeks along the Arab-Israeli frontiers. The Israelis have been pressing for similar assurances from the United States in connection with the proposed programme of military aid for the Arabs. The Israeli efforts have been reflected in the public pronouncements of Zionist organisations in the United States. Mr. Comay has voiced similar views in Canada.

Economic Factors

23. Economic factors may in the end determine the future course of Arab-Israeli relations. Both the Israelis and the Arabs are suffering from the disruption of normal commercial relations in the area. The Israeli economy is greatly hampered by the Arab blockade and Israel would like to dispose of its excess industrial goods in Arab countries. The Arabs, in turn, would welcome an opportunity to sell oil and agricultural produce in Israeli markets. All the countries in the area are acutely aware of the need for economic development. All suffer the heavy burden of military spending. None of the countries, but particularly Israel, can ever flourish until peace has been established and the economic life of the area is permitted to develop freely. It is perhaps not too improbable, therefore, that the very urgency of the economic problems will ultimately prompt the nations concerned to strive harder to overcome their political differences.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL — REQUEST FOR 10,000 ROUNDS OF
75 MM AMMUNITION

When this request was first received, it was referred for comment to the appropriate United Kingdom and United States authorities. We learned that the United Kingdom, without reference to the Arms Working Party, had agreed to provide Israel with 7,000 rounds. In the circumstances, the United Kingdom authorities expressed the hope that, if we decided to meet the Israel request, we would not provide more than 7,000 rounds, so that the total would not exceed 14,000 rounds. The United Kingdom attitude was apparently based on the probability that the ammunition would be used in tanks.

2. The United States authorities, who indicated that they would "not interpose any objection" to our filling the order for 10,000 rounds apparently based their thinking on the assumption that this ammunition would be used for field artillery. In the circumstances, our people in Washington were asked to discuss the question again with the State Department. The attached reply has just been received.† You will see that "while United States authorities would be just as happy if no 75 mm ammunition were to be sold to Israel, they did not believe that the quantities which we were considering would offer grounds for serious objection on their part."

3. In my memorandum to you of March 4,† I indicated that, unless very strong and convincing reasons were given why we should not permit the sale of the full amount of 10,000 rounds, it was not expected that we would recommend any reduction in the order. In the light of the attached letter from Washington, in which it is indicated that, within the range of 10,000 to 20,000 rounds, an export of this type of ammunition would not cause too much concern, and, in view of the fact that the United Kingdom is itself permitting the export of 7,000 rounds, there would not appear to be any substantial reason for refusing the original request for 10,000 rounds.

4. Because of the earlier U.K. suggestion that our order should be reduced to 7,000 rounds, I think that we would wish to consider further the question of the provision of an additional 5,000 rounds. At the present stage, I do not think that we would necessarily recommend against the additional order, but we would like to have time to discuss the question with the J.I.B. and others concerned.⁴⁹

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL

You will recall that Mr. Croll⁵⁰ and Mr. Comay called upon you recently to seek your approval for the sale and export to Israel of 15,000 rounds of 75 mm ammunition. In a memorandum dated March 29 you were informed of the United Kingdom Government's desire that approval should not be granted for anything more than 7500 rounds of this type of ammunition. You were also advised that the United States Government would probably not boggle at a quantity approaching 20,000 rounds.

2. In the event you approved the shipment of 10,000 rounds, and the Department of Trade and Commerce issued Permit No. 328881 on April 9 to cover this export, which is valued at $37,740.00. You also directed that further consideration be given to the question of permitting the supply of 5000 additional shells.

3. Accordingly, the C.R.O., was offered another opportunity to comment, and their reply has just been received. It is now attached for your consideration.† The main point of their argument appears to be that they themselves would not permit a similar sale on the grounds that the Israeli stocks of 75 mm Sherman tank ammunition are already adequate for their present needs and that further shipments would contribute to the building up of Israel's offensive tank potential beyond its present level. Obviously, this is a matter of judgment and we appear to be faced with the choice of accepting the United Kingdom opinion or that of Mr. Comay, who assures us that anything Israel can get from us is needed exclusively for legitimate defensive needs. It may be added that this attitude meets with considerable scepticism in the United States as well as in the United Kingdom.

4. Perhaps the safest and wisest course for us to follow in the present circumstances would be to postpone a final decision until the present tension in Palestine

abates, or until the Security Council disposes of the recent "incidents" on the Israel-Jordan border which it has under consideration.⁵¹

5. The subject of Israel's 'offensive tank potential' leads to the question of permitting the export of additional quantities of M-4 (Sherman) tank parts for Canada. I understand Mr. Riley has raised this matter with you on a couple of occasions recently, and that he called to discuss it this morning. Following his meeting he called on an officer of this Department, in accordance with your suggestion, and you may be interested to know what was said. It can be briefly summarized as follows:

It is, of course, Canada's desire to have close bonds of friendship with Israel, as with other countries in the Near East. For this reason the Government's policy on arms exports is not to stand in the way of anything that is required for maintaining or servicing Israel's existing stocks of military equipment, or which is required to meet Israel's legitimate defensive needs (e.g. ammunition, etc.). However, we have a general understanding with the Governments of the United Kingdom and United States (and France by implication) to respect the policy laid down in the Tripartite Declaration of May 25, 1950, about not contributing to a "sale of arms race" or an increase in the military power of any country in the area above its proper defensive levels. This understanding reflects Canada's interest in reducing the risk of serious unrest or conflict in that part of the world. We understand that Israel already has an adequate tank force to meet this requirement, and we regard it as reasonable for Israel to have an appropriate supply of maintenance parts for these tanks. It was emphasized that the decision you took last October 8 to permit the sale of $176,992.63 worth of M-4 tank parts was based on a judgment that that quantity was adequate to maintain Israel's present stock of tanks for about two years, on the scale of consumption applied to the Canadian forces in peacetime, assuming that Israel had no stockpiles of such parts already, and that they acquired none for two years from other sources. Given the obligation of the three powers (United States, United Kingdom, France) to maintain peace and stability in the area, and Canada's interest in not interfering with that objective, the Canadian Government would probably find it difficult and embarrassing to permit any further exports of M-4 tank parts to Israel, especially as that might expose Canada to criticism of disturbing the equilibrium of military power in the area in terms of tank forces, or adding to Israel's tank offensive potential.

SALE OF JET AIRCRAFT TO ISRAEL

As you may know, the Canadian Government (Department of Defence Production) has a Licence Agreement with North American Aviation Inc., the original producer of the F-86 Sabre jet aircraft. Canadair Limited was appointed by the Department of Defence Production to act as the Canadian Government's agent to manufacture Sabre jets under the foregoing Agreement, which contains a clause reading in part "subject to the prior written approval of the Manufacturer in respect of any particular country, or part thereof, to sell, lease, service and maintain the aeroplane in any part of the world."

2. Canadair has now been advised by North American Aviation Inc., that they are free to export F-86's, subject to the condition that none are sold to the United States or to any country not approved by the United States Department of State to receive F-86 aircraft from sources within the United States. This is covered by another part of the Licence Agreement which reads as follows: "The Canadian Government shall not during the term of this Agreement sell, lease or otherwise transfer the aeroplane into any territory for which the aeroplane has not been released by the Government of the United States of America."

3. The Department of Defence Production expects to receive formal confirmation from North American Aviation Inc., of their willingness to grant export privileges to Canadair under this Licence Agreement.

4. At the moment, there is a specific problem related to Israel. The facts are these: Shamir, the head of the Government of Israel Defence Ministry Purchasing Mission in New York, visited North American Aviation Inc., in Los Angeles on March 25, and requested a quotation on 24 F-86-F fighter-bomber aircraft. This request was discussed with North American's representative in Washington to determine the State Department's attitude towards such a sale. According to the Vice-President of North American Aviation, the Department of State was understood to be willing to give favourable consideration to an export licence, and he wrote to Mr. Shamir on April 14 indicating that his Company could not quote for this type of aircraft but the Canadair Company could. Moreover, the Israeli Air Attaché in Washington is said to have been promised by the U.S.A.R. a definite yes or no answer about the export of F-86's in the near future, and Mr. Shamir in turn has indicated to Canadair that unless he receives a quotation by April 30, the Government of Israel will seek to obtain these aircraft elsewhere.

5. You will appreciate that the Department of Defence Production looks to us to let them know with the least possible delay whether:

(a) It is true that the State Department would now be willing to permit the sale of 24 F-86's to Israel, and

(b) In those circumstances, the Canadian Government would grant similar permission.

6. As a first step, therefore, please approach the State Department and let us know by next Tuesday or Wednesday, if possible, what the State Department's attitude is on this subject. We do not at this time want to raise the question of sales of F-86's to other Middle East countries but obviously that possibility should be borne in mind.

(For London only) In the light of the United Kingdom's agreement a year ago to sell 14 Meteor jets to Israel, we would appreciate learning whether they would offer any objections to a Canadian sale of 24 F-86's. You will, of course, appreciate that these preliminary enquiries are necessary before the subject can be brought to the attention of Cabinet.

SALE OF JET AIRCRAFT TO ISRAEL

On the basis of your telegram under reference we discussed the United States attitude towards the possible sale of jet aircraft to Israel with Margrave of the State Department's Office of Munitions Control on April 23.

2. He said that within the last two months Israeli representatives had approached the State Department with the firm offer of their government to get rid of all combat aircraft (mainly P-51's) which it presently had, if the United States would permit the export to Israel of twenty-four F-86 Sabre jets. The Israeli representatives said that Israel wished to standardize its air force equipment (i.e. to have only United States type equipment) and at the same time to modernize its air force. This would not involve an exchange of one for one but the sale or scrapping of all presently held combat aircraft for twenty-four sabre jets. A vaguer offer to enter into similar arrangements with respect to all heavy guns was also put forward.

3. It was for this reason and for this reason only that the Israeli request for jet fighter aircraft had not been turned down out of hand by the State Department. No final decision had been taken on the request although Margrave thought one would be taken within a week or ten days, and promised to inform us immediately. The State Department's attitude (and that of the Munitions Division in particular) is generally unfavourable and Margrave thought that the request would be turned down, attractive as it was in some of its features. He could not, however, be certain of rejection of the request.

4. Margrave told us that the State Department's negative attitude was based on the unreliability of Israeli promises. Whatever, therefore, has been said by the Vice-President of North American Aviation or by Shamir of the Israeli purchasing mission, as reported in Paragraph 4 of your telegram under reference. Margrave said that it is incorrect to say that any decision has been taken by the State Department. Incidentally the date of April 30 mentioned by Shamir as a final date for decision makes little impression on the State Department. The original Israeli approach set April 1 and then April 15 and finally April 30 as the "take it or leave it" date. Somewhat irreverently Margrave commented that the maxim "seek and ye shall find" had little relevance when really good jet aircraft were the object of the search.

5. We have not, in our more or less regular discussions on the export of arms with the Munitions Division, mentioned the potential surplus production capabilities of Canadair and the problems which it creates in disposal of F-86 jets. Our discussion on the specific Israeli interest offered a useful opportunity to raise the matter in very general terms. Margrave needed little prompting and spoke frankly of United States thinking on the sale of jet fighter aircraft abroad. The United States believed that there were many "worthy" markets for such aircraft (e.g. the NATO allies and South America) which did not involve the problems and risks posed by sale to the "inflammable" Middle East. So far as F-86's were concerned he said that the United States authorities would not be concerned whether they were sold from Canada or the United States so long as the customers were "acceptable". He said frankly that while certain questions of commercial advantage were sometimes present in United States-United Kingdom exchanges on such matters, they did not enter into United States thinking so far as Canada was concerned. He said that Canada enjoyed "unconditional most-favoured-nation thinking" in the export of arms so far as the United States was concerned. You will be in a better position than we to administer to this view what grains of salt are necessary. Margrave said he understood that North American Aviation was cutting back sharply on the production of F-86's and offered the "layman's opinion" that Canadair might soon be the best, if not the only, well-stocked source of supply for the aircraft.

6. In summary, it is not true that at the moment the State Department would give favourable consideration to the sale of F-86's to Israel. Furthermore it appears likely that when a final decision on the matter is taken it will be a negative decision.

7. Mr. Chappell who received separate advice from his department on this matter has seen this telegram. He agrees that there is no need at the moment for Mr. Redpath of Canadair to come to Washington to brief the Embassy on the commercial aspects of the problem. Please pass a copy of this message to T.N. Beaupré, Assistant Deputy Minister, D.D.P.

EXPORT OF F-86'S TO ISRAEL

As Gautrey is on leave we passed on your enquiry to Curson, Head of the Defence Department of the CRO. He has now replied that the United Kingdom authorities hope very much that you will not proceed with this transaction.

2. Their principal argument is the general political one — that at this time it is more than ever necessary to preserve the existing balance of forces in the Middle East and to prevent either party to the Palestine dispute from building up a preponderance of war material and thus encouraging the development of an uncontrolled armaments race. It is considered here that taking into account efficiency of operation as well as size, the Israeli air force is at least a match for the combined air power of the Arab States and that the addition of 24 modern jet aircraft would give the Israelis an overwhelming superiority. The Foreign Office and the Ministry of Defence feel that in view of doubts as to the Israeli Government's capacity to resist internal pressure from the advocates of extreme action against Jordan in particular, it would be most unwise to run the risk involved in allowing this shipment. (In this connection it might be embarrassing if we sold the Israelis F-86's and, subsequently, aggression by Israel resulted in the United Kingdom going to Jordan's aid under the terms of the Anglo-Jordan Treaty. This may appear an extreme hypothesis but it cannot be entirely ruled out in view of the state of tension now prevailing along the Israel-Jordan border).

3. I should add that the United Kingdom's agreement to sell Meteor jets to Israel a year ago seems to me to have only a very tenuous bearing on the present enquiry. The offer of Meteors to Israel in September 1952 was not an isolated gesture. It was matched by a similar offer to each of three Arab States (Syria, Lebanon and Iraq). Apart from the obvious commercial considerations, it had a definite political purpose, e.g. an attempt to improve United Kingdom relations with the States concerned, and in particular to attract their co-operation in the establishment of MEDO. Moreover the scope and direction of the offers were carefully designed with a view to bringing the air power of the Arab States and Israel into rough balance. In the case of your present enquiry the circumstances seem to me to be substantially different. The effect of selling 24 F-86's to Israel at this juncture would give that country a marked advantage in offensive air power in exchange for little or no apparent political gain, and at the risk of giving offence not only to the Arab Governments but also to the United Kingdom.

4. For these reasons we did not think it advisable to link the present enquiry with the 1952 sale of Meteors. We did, however, refer in passing to the more recent United Kingdom offer of 7 Meteor day fighters to Israel and 6 Meteor night fighters to Syria (see our letter No. 407 of February 26, 1954).† Curson's answer to this was:

(a) That the two offers balanced one another and were in any case small in quantity;

(b) That the original agreement to sell had been made before the Palestine situation had deteriorated to its present tense state;

(c) That the Israelis had not followed up the offer and that the United Kingdom Government hoped they would not revert to it;

(d) That F-86's were in any case more advanced and potent striking weapons than Meteors and that, as one of the governments primarily responsible for maintaining peace in the area, the United Kingdom would prefer that F-86's would not be made available to either party at this stage, and certainly not to the Israelis alone.

5. We did not feel free to discuss with Curson the possibility mentioned in paragraph 6 of your telegram of F-86 sales to other Middle East countries. We are inclined to think however that such sales would be opposed here unless possibly

(a) They involved very limited numbers of aircraft and

(b) They were arranged so as not to disturb the balance of air power as between Israel and the Arab States. But even this presupposes the dropping of the objection in sub-paragraph 4(d) above to any supply to Middle East countries of jet aircraft as far advanced in type as the F-86. I suppose there might also be some question whether the Arab States would be in a position to pay for such purchases from Canada.

6. Incidentally, Curson said he would be surprised if the United States authorities agreed to the sale of F-86's to Israel at this state. If the soundings in Washington show otherwise, we should be glad to raise the matter again here.

SALE OF JET AIRCRAFT TO ISRAEL

On June 17 the Israeli Minister called to seek support for an application soon to be made to Canadair for twenty-four F-86's. He indicated that the Israeli Government feel that they are, in present circumstances, entitled to an air fighter defence of two squadrons, and that as they cannot match the Arab states in quantity, they have to rely solely on quality for their air defence. Their plans are for two squadrons, which they do not consider to be excessive, and which, if armed with short-range jet interceptors, could not be considered offensive in character. They feel that it would be useful for the common defence of the free world to have two F-86 squadrons based in Israel, and they are willing to give every assurance, official, on the highest level, that these planes will never be used for any purpose except defence.

2. Comay also indicated that the North American Aviation Company appears favourably inclined toward the sale of twenty-four Sabre jets to Israel.

3. In the light of the foregoing, please approach the State Department and ask whether a decision has yet been reached on the sale of twenty-four F-86's to Israel. In paragraph 3 of your WA-724 Margrave promised to inform us immediately and expected a decision within ten days.

4. For London only: Please let us know whether there has been any change in the United Kingdom attitude since your telegram No. 430 of April 27.

SALE OF JET AIRCRAFT TO ISRAEL

I attach a copy of teletype WA-1163 of June 29 from our Embassy in Washington from which you will see that the United States Government would not authorize the sale and export of twenty-four F-86 Sabre jets to Israel. This means, of course, that the Canadair Company would not be permitted to fill such an order, and in the circumstances I have prepared for your approval and signature a letter to Mr. Comay in this sense.

SALE OF JET AIRCRAFT TO ISRAEL

Margrave of the State Department's Office of Munitions Control told us that a few days ago the State Department informed Mr. Eban, the Israeli Ambassador to the United States, and his Service Attaché, Colonel Hertzog, that a permit would not be granted by the United States authorities for the export of any F-86 jet aircraft from the United States to Israel.

2. Margrave said that while all the "paper work" on this matter had not yet been completed, the State Department had taken an opportunity which presented itself naturally to transmit to the Israeli authorities a decision which in any case would have been taken soon when the written views of interested agencies were assembled.

3. Margrave said that the same assurances which you were given by Comay were offered to the United States authorities but had had no effect on their decision. Margrave said that a decision to supply Israel with jet aircraft at this time would have been completely contrary to basic United States policy towards Israel and the Middle East. Margrave said it was probably true that the North American Aviation Company was favourably inclined towards the sale of the F-86's to Israel but he added emphatically "the North American Aviation Company does not represent the United States Government".

EXPORT OF TANK PARTS TO ISRAEL

About a year ago the Department of Trade and Commerce received an export permit application from the Levy Company covering $742,063 worth of Sherman tank parts. Later, in September, a second application was submitted for $399,000 worth of steel track assemblies for Sherman tanks, also ordered by Israel.

As this equipment was of United States type, and indeed largely of United States origin, the State Department was consulted. At that time it was considered to be dangerous to the peace and stability of the Near East to permit Israel to acquire any more than a fraction of the total amount ordered, on the grounds that Israel might otherwise increase her offensive tank potential and disturb the balance of military power in the area. Accordingly, a shipment of only $176,992 worth of tank parts was allowed to go forward this January.

Recently, however, the United States authorities, at our request, reviewed the situation and came to the conclusion that it might now be reasonable to allow Israel to acquire about $1,440,000 worth of maintenance parts for her Sherman tank force per year (based roughly on the United States Army scale of consumption).

As it happened, the Levy Company's contract to supply the balance of the larger order of tank parts ($565,071) was due to expire on June 1, but was prolonged until June 25 by the Israeli Legation here in Ottawa, pending the outcome of the review mentioned above. On learning of the change in the attitude of the United States Government on the eve of the expiry date of the Levy Company's contract, I felt it would be in accordance with the wishes of Cabinet for me to authorize the granting of export permits accordingly, in order that some legitimate business might not be lost for no good reason. This I did, and I would now be grateful to have the sanction of Ministers, in accordance with the Cabinet directive on the Export of Arms dated January 21, 1954, for my approval of the export of

(i) $565,071 worth of M-4 tank parts

(ii) $399,000 worth of M-4 tank tracks, deliveries to be spread as evenly as possible over a six month period so as not to arouse undue Arab anxieties.

A more recent Levy Company application of May 11 for $224,000 worth of Sherman tracks has also come before my Department. However, as approval of that quantity would, if added to supplies Israel has already acquired this year from other sources, bring the total of deliveries for 1954 over the amount reckoned safe by the State Department, I presume Ministers would agree to its being deferred.⁵³

Mr. Comay called on me yesterday to discuss the above subject, more particularly the order for 25-pounder guns. I pointed out to him that our information indicated that Israel already had 402 25-pounder or equivalent guns and that this far exceeded those held by her neighbours. Comay was skeptical of our figures and is going to send me their own version of the facts. He emphasized, however, that the order in question would not add to their existing holdings but would replace obsolescent or worn-out guns which they now possess. I pressed him for an assurance on this point, having regard to your skepticism concerning it and he told me that he would give me a written communication to the effect that every 25-pounder gun on their order would replace an existing weapon. This seems to me to alter the situation somewhat and may require a reconsideration of our attitude.

2. I am also worried about the United Kingdom policy of shipping 25-pounders to Israel, without informing us in advance, and then telling us later that "they have enough, so please do not send any more from Canada".

3. Mr. Comay was very depressed about the general situation in the Middle East and felt that Israel was being hard-pressed to maintain any kind of existence in view of the implacable hostility of its neighbours. They were having trouble enough holding back extremist elements and this difficulty would be increased by recent developments, more particularly the lifting of the United Kingdom arms embargo on Egypt and the new sympathy and support in Washington for the Arab States. I told him that I felt that the United Kingdom Government was wise and well-advised to make the arrangement with Egypt over the Suez area which has just been concluded, as it was a step in the direction of better relations and general pacification in that area. I also said that our opinion was that there was no possibility of the United Kingdom sending a vast quantity of arms to Egypt or the Arab States in the near future. Comay was not critical of British policy but emphasized that his Government could not help but be alarmed at the increasing military strength of countries who had declared often and bitterly their intention of destroying Israel. He also denied flatly and without qualification the American and British contention that Israel was already better armed than the Arab States and in a better position to defend itself.

4. I told Comay in conclusion that we would have another look at the 25-pounder question in the light of the subsequent information which he was going to secure for me.

SALE OF ARMS TO ISRAEL

You may wish to have my views on the attached memorandum from the Minister dated September 9.

2. As the Minister implied in his first paragraph, our objections to the sale of forty-eight 25 pdr. guns would fall away if we could be sure that those guns would not increase Israel's holdings, i.e., if every replaced gun were melted down for scrap or otherwise destroyed or resold abroad. If that were done, it would not matter to us whether our estimate of the Israeli holdings is accurate or not, because what we are concerned about is not how many guns they now have but rather that Canadian sales should not add to that number and thereby disturb the present precarious balance of power in the area. Of course, our wishes would not be met if the old guns were merely withdrawn from active service and placed in storage whence they could be reactivated at any time on short notice.

3. As you know, Mr. Comay has now sent a letter† to the Minister on this subject, confirming his earlier assurances that every 25 pdr. gun on their order would "replace" an existing weapon. There now seems to be no choice open to Cabinet but to approve the sale of the guns to Israel, for otherwise they would be in the position of appearing to cast doubt upon the integrity and good faith of the Israeli Government. Attached, therefore, are a memorandum for the Minister and a draft memorandum to Cabinet,† for your approval.

4. We would expect that, if Mr. Comay finds he has hit upon the right formula for obtaining military equipment from Canada, he will probably raise the question (brought up by Mr. Salmon informally last July in discussions with a member of the Economic Division) of fifty Sherman tanks, reputedly needed to replace an equal number of worn-out tanks. A similar offer was made to Mr. MacKay last April in respect of F-86 Sabre jet aircraft. We found it hard to believe that the Israeli military authorities would sincerely agree to scrap a whole squadron of fighters just to get twenty-four Sabre jets from us. It just didn't seem realistic.

5. At the time of the first approach of this nature (and our feelings have not changed) we drew attention on the one hand to the danger of relying entirely upon the honourable intentions of the Israeli Government in a situation such as that which now exists in the Middle East and on the other hand to the obvious and perhaps greater political disadvantages that would be entailed in any scheme involving our Embassy in Tel Aviv in an armament supervisory capacity.

6. Concerning the Minister's second paragraph, there is no defence we care to offer on behalf of the United Kingdom policy, to the inconsistencies of which the Minister drew attention. Nevertheless, as they have sold no 25 pdrs. since the situation in Palestine took a turn for the worse a year ago, I do not think we could charge them with duplicity. As you may have seen from telegram No. 1124 of September 10 from Canada House (copy attached),† they have now forewarned us of a possible change in policy about sales of jet fighters because of the French sales of Mystères. This would seem to indicate that they are playing the game with us.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL⁵⁴

I attach for your approval and signature a memorandum to the Cabinet† concerning the Israeli request that Canada supply forty-eight 25-pounder guns and trailers.⁵⁵ The memorandum recommends that the sale of these guns be approved, if the Canadian supply considerations make it possible to release the equipment requested.

2. It occurs to me that some of your Cabinet colleagues may ask about the political implications of the export of these guns. In reply you may wish to refer to some or all of the following points:

(a) The political situation in the Middle East is complex and the full implications of the present order are not readily foreseen, because of the conflicting information received from parties to the disputes in the area and from friendly governments with their own interests there. The Departmental assessment of the situation is therefore not free from bias and doubt.

(b) In concert with other supplying countries among the Western democracies, Canada is anxious not to disturb the delicate balance of power in the Middle East. At the same time arms are being supplied, on a basis of equality as between Israel and the Arab countries, in order to fill a power vacuum in a sensitive spot in the cold war and to ensure to some extent the stability of the area.

(c) Recent developments have produced improvement in relations between the Arab states and the Western democracies. As a result some Arab states, notably Egypt and Iraq, are to receive additional military aid from the United States and some from the United Kingdom. The Israeli authorities have complained publicly that this additional supply of arms will jeopardize the position of Israel, since, according to the Israelis, the Arabs have not abandoned their determination to destroy the Israeli state.

⁵⁴ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Discussed at Cabinet.

⁵⁵ Approuvé par le Cabinet le 19 octobre 1954./Approved by Cabinet, October 19, 1954.

(d) At the same time, despite recurring outbreaks of violence and threatening undercurrents, there is room for hope that a slow but gradual easing of tension in Arab-Israeli relations is taking place. There is private resignation among enlightened Arabs that Israel has come to stay. The Israelis, for their part, have announced important concessions they are prepared to grant as regards the Palestinian refugees in Arab countries. General Burns has succeeded in restoring the prestige of the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization and persuaded the Israelis to resume cooperation with it.

(e) The Israelis may have been persuaded to make the aforementioned concessions because they felt safer. Their anxiety increases, however, when they see the Arabs growing in strength; the perceptible change in United States policy toward closer relations with the Arabs has produced that result. It might not, therefore, upset the balance of power but merely restore Israeli confidence, if the guns on order were to be supplied.

(f) These guns will increase the fire-power of the Israeli forces, because the guns will probably replace obsolete weapons. Taking into account the increased arms to be supplied to the Arab countries, however, the net effect may be to raise the scale of the supply of arms to the Middle East as a whole but to maintain the balance as between Israel and the Arab states.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO ISRAEL

We informed Margrave of the State Department's Office of Munitions Control of the decision, outlined in your telegram under reference, to allow the sale of 48 25-pounder guns and trailers to Israel in what was certainly not one of the easiest meetings we have had with a State Department official. Margrave said, among other things, that he was certain that United States authorities would regard it as "most unfortunate" that approval had been given for the sale to Israel of these items.

2. Since Margrave has been out of Washington on another mission for some weeks we took the opportunity to discuss the arms situation in the Middle East in more general terms. When the discussion turned to Egypt we raised the point covered in paragraph 2 of your telegram under reference. Margrave denied flatly that it was the intention of the United States to provide Egypt with large quantities of military equipment now or in the future. He said that reports in the press on United States intentions with respect to the Arab states are completely out of balance and he suspected that they were in large part inspired by Israeli representatives or sympathizers.

3. The present situation so far as Egypt is concerned, Margrave said, was that the United States Government would give favourable consideration to any efforts made by the Egyptian Government to purchase commercially reasonable quantities of military equipment. It was impossible for the United States Government to accede to any requests for the supply of military equipment to Egypt on a government-to-government basis since there was no military aid agreement between the two countries. It was only correct to say that the United States Government was investigating the possibility of a military aid agreement with Egypt. So far, the Egyptian Government had not been willing to enter into such an agreement in the foreseeable future. (Economic aid was another matter and some progress had been made in this field).

4. Margrave went on to say that even if it did prove possible to negotiate a military aid agreement with Egypt it would cover a very moderate programme of military assistance. He pointed out that the military agreement made with Iraq had, in spite of the publicity given to it, covered only a small programme of military aid. Margrave said that so far as he was aware there had been no official announcements by the United States Government of its intentions with respect to the supply of military equipment to Egypt.

5. Margrave spoke at some length of the worries of the State Department over the apparently unending campaign of the Israeli Government to arm itself to the teeth. He said that recently, for example, Israel had attempted to buy a large number of thousand-pound bombs from the United Kingdom. He was sure we would realize the significance of such an order. In a country the size of Israel "there was scarcely enough room to drop a thousand-pound bomb for practice purposes". United States authorities thought this request had been scotched.

6. The State Department was exerting the greatest possible pressure to prevent the sale of the Mystère Jet aircraft which the French Government has undertaken to supply to Israel (London's telegram No. 1325 of October 20).[†] The State Department was still hopeful that it might be possible to prevent this sale. Margrave said that an opinion did exist within the United States military that Israel might be preparing to seize some points in neighbouring Arab states. He stressed that this was not, as yet, a view held by the United States Government. Interested officials, however, did not rule out the possibility that Israel's frantic efforts to add continually to its military stock-pile might lead to aggressive action by Israel in the not too distant future.

7. Margrave said finally that United States policy on the supply of arms to Israel had not changed and that any decisions taken by the United States Government to permit a moderate increase in the supply of arms to the Arab states would arise from its belief that the imbalance of armed strength in the Middle East in favour of Israel should be redressed.

CONTROL OVER THE EXPORT OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT

The Export and Import Permits Act, 1947, confers on the Minister of Trade and Commerce authority to issue export permits. In accordance with precedents that have become established and pursuant to a number of Cabinet decisions made between 1946 and 1949, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and in some cases, the Minister of National Defence, is consulted with respect to proposed exports of military equipment. Where the phrase "military equipment" occurs in this memorandum it should be taken to refer to the equipment defined in Group 8, Schedule 2 of the Export and Import Permits Act.

2. Experience over the past years has shown that, in carrying out the procedures for interdepartmental consultation, certain routine delays are unavoidable. At times, however, these delays have led to undesirable results, such as the cancellation of orders. Prompt service is vital to legitimate commercial interests, especially in the case of exports of equipment having civilian as well as military uses (e.g. civilian aircraft and parts, vehicle, train, and radio parts, used military apparel) consigned to civilian consumers in friendly countries. Moreover, in contrast with conditions obtaining just after the war, it would no longer appear necessary for the Department of External Affairs to be consulted about the political implications of proposed shipments of military equipment to the Governments of Commonwealth countries (except India, Pakistan and Ceylon) or to our NATO allies and their dependent territories (with the exceptions listed in sub-paragraph 3 (f)) if the Departments of Trade and Commerce and National Defence are satisfied about considerations of supply and security (i.e. degree of classification of the military equipment, etc.) and about safeguards against unauthorized diversions. There would normally be no reason on political grounds for refusing export permits for shipments of military equipment to those countries.

3. In the present circumstances, it is considered desirable to consolidate the various Cabinet decisions taken in the past, and to revise and simplify the procedures for interdepartmental consultation on arms exports. Accordingly, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence, has the honour to recommend as follows:

(a) Whenever the Security Council (or the General Assembly) declares an embargo on shipments of military equipment to any country, export permits will not be granted for such shipments to that country until the embargo is lifted;

(b) Export permits are not required under the Act for shipments to the United States if that is the country of final destination. Similarly the United States does not require export permits for shipments to Canada when this is the country of ultimate destination. It is, therefore, in Canada's interest to preserve our freedom to import military equipment from the United States without permits, and this implies a need on our part to bear in mind the United States Government's policy on arms exports when considering proposed shipments of military equipment, especially when it is of United States type or origin;

(c) The Secretary of State for External Affairs should always refuse permits for shipments of military equipment to communist controlled areas other than Yugoslavia;

(d) In general, export permits will not normally be granted except with Cabinet's approval;

(i) for shipments of military equipment to areas (other than Indo-China and Malaya) of political unrest or local conflict. Under this heading would be included areas where hostilities are in progress or appear to be imminent, or where shipments of military equipment might contribute to an increase in local unrest and tension;

(ii) for shipments of military equipment, or significant quantities of strategic goods used in producing or maintaining such equipment, consigned to the Chinese Nationalist Armed Forces;

(e) Export permits will not normally be granted for shipments to any countries of equipment intended for military use unless the recipient country's Government has approved the transaction and has, if requested to do so, given appropriate assurances that the military equipment will not be re-exported without permission from the Canadian Government;

(f) The Minister of Trade and Commerce will not normally consult the Secretary of State for External Affairs about exports of military equipment to

(i) the United States, the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa and their dependent territories (except Hong Kong and Malaya);

(ii) member countries of NATO not included in 3 (f)(i) and their dependent territories (except Indo-China, Macao, Morocco and Tunisia);

(iii) NATO commands;

(iv) Canadian forces outside Canada;

(v) Canadian airlines for use at their bases abroad, such as the TCA base at Shannon, Ireland;

(g) The Minister of Trade and Commerce will normally consult the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence concerning applications to export to any destination other than those listed in (f) above items in Group 8 Schedule 2 of the Act when they appear to be intended for military uses in the importing country.

(h) The Minister of Trade and Commerce will normally consult with the Secretary of State for External Affairs and with the Minister of National Defence concerning applications for permits to export military equipment to destinations in areas that are, by agreement between the three Ministers, regarded as politically sensitive. For example, the following areas would at the present time come under this heading:

Japan
Korea
Taiwan
Macao
The Philippines
Indo-China
Thailand
Malaya
Indonesia
Burma
Ceylon
Pakistan
India
Afghanistan
Iran
Iraq
Nepal
Saudi-Arabia
Syria
Jordan
Lebanon
Israel
Egypt
Tunisia
Morocco
Libya
Spain
Guatemala
Germany
Austria
Sweden
Finland
Yugoslavia
Free Territory of Trieste
Hong Kong

This list would be kept under constant review and would be modified as often as necessary by agreement between the three Ministers.

(i) The Minister of Trade and Commerce may at his discretion consult with the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence about proposed shipments to any destinations of strategic materials not listed in Group 8 Schedule 2 of the Act;

(j) Within the framework of the policy outlined above, the Secretary of State for External Affairs shall, at his discretion, deal with the export permit applications referred to him without further reference to Cabinet except where new questions of policy or important political considerations are involved.⁵⁶

UNITED STATES PROPOSAL FOR UNITED ACTION IN SOUTHEAST ASIA

You may wish to use the following notes in discussing in Cabinet the United States proposal for United Action in Southeast Asia.

United States Approaches

2. In a public address on March 29 Mr. Dulles called for "united action" to keep Southeast Asia from falling under Communist control.¹ Beginning on April 2, Mr. Dulles called in turn the French, British, Australian, New Zealand, Philippine and Thailand Ambassadors, told them of the United States appreciation of the critical importance for Southeast Asian security of holding on in Indochina and asked that these governments and those of the three Associated States join the United States in a 10-power defensive grouping apparently somewhat on the NATO pattern within the reserved right of regional defence stipulated by Article 51 of the United Nations Charter. The "united action" which these countries would agree upon would be to cooperate in preventing the further over-running of Southeast Asia by Communism. Mr. Dulles does not appear to have formulated a precise written proposal.

¹ Voir/See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXX, No. 772, April 12, 1954, pp. 539-542.

3. From accounts which we have received from our Missions in London, Canberra and Wellington it would appear that Mr. Dulles asked that consideration be given to issuing a declaration which would:

- (a) warn Communist China against further intervention in the war in Indochina;
- (b) affirm their united intention to prevent Indochina from falling under Communist domination;
- (c) express their resolution to check further Communist aggression in Southeast Asia.

In addition, the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand were asked if they would be prepared to make available sea and air forces, but not ground forces, for prompt use in Indochina. They were also asked to stimulate French morale.

4. On April 7 Mr. Dulles informed Mr. Heeney about the United States proposals because "the United States regarded us as a Pacific as well as an Atlantic power and knew of our interest in the security of the whole area." He did not suggest any Canadian contribution or aid nor did he suggest Canadian membership.

T United States Objectives

5. Some of the purposes of the U.S. proposal seem to be these:

- (a) to strengthen the French will to continue the fight in Indochina;
- (b) to prevent a French cave-in at Geneva;
- (c) to prepare U.S. public opinion for the possibility of increased intervention in Indochina;
- (d) to provide a framework within which the French would be obliged to accept United States military advice as well as military matériel for the war in Indochina;
- (e) to put pressure on the French to grant real independence to Laos, Cambodia and Vietnam so as to ensure support for collective action from all the proposed participants of the association;
- (f) to prevent the outflanking of the United States defensive positions in the Western Pacific;
- (g) to prevent the Southeast Asia rice bowl from falling under Communist control.

6. Mr. Casey told our High Commissioner on April 7 that the Australian Government does not want to give the United States the impression that they are dragging their feet on proposals for security arrangements in the Southeast Asia area in which Australia has a vital concern. Nevertheless, the Government is reluctant to commit itself:

- (a) to any military action;
- (b) to what might be considered a defense of French colonialism;
- (c) to action on any other basis than through the United Nations.

Mr. Casey stated publicly in Parliament that day that "Australia cannot but welcome this American interest in preserving the security and independence of the nations of the Southeast Asia area and the South Pacific." He considered that reference to the United Nations would require careful study. Dr. Evatt replied that he took "the view that the situation in Indochina does demand intervention by the United Nations and that it has long since ceased to be a question of internal or domestic jurisdiction."

The Australians have since then made strong representations to the French in Paris concerning their interest in seeing that the Communist threat to Indochina and Southeast Asia is resisted. The French replied that they had no intention of giving up the battle or agreeing to a ceasefire unless safe and reasonable terms were arranged in the negotiations at Geneva.

New Zealand Attitude

7. The New Zealand Government has taken a very cautious attitude. While reluctant to disappoint United States hopes, they are likely to fall back on their traditional practice of going along with United Kingdom and Australian thinking concerning crises of common concern. In view of their difficulty in maintaining a full artillery battalion in Korea they are not likely to wish to assume additional military commitments.

French Attitude

8. There has been no full statement of the French reaction to Mr. Dulles' proposal. The French feel that this move should strengthen their bargaining position with the Communists at Geneva. They see many difficulties in the proposal. For the present they consider that the effort should be centred on the defence of Dien Bien Phu.

United Kingdom Attitude

9. The United Kingdom Government is sympathetic to the long-term objectives implied in the Dulles initiative. They doubt if a declaration should be made before the Geneva Conference as it might give the appearance that our side was not prepared to negotiate a settlement. They have misgivings about any warning declaration addressed to the Chinese Communists at this time. They consider that there would be a great difference between in effect ordering the Chinese Communists to stop giving undefined aid as they are at present giving in Indochina and taking action to prevent the Chinese breaking any agreement they might make in Geneva. They dislike any suggestions for bombarding the China coast or threats to do so. They suggest that a declaration would be more appropriate after the Geneva Conference, either to guarantee the settlement reached there or based on the failure to reach a settlement.

Following consultations between Mr. Dulles and Mr. Eden in London on April 12, a joint announcement is being made expressing concern over the threat to peace and security in Southeast Asia created by the activities of Communist forces in Indochina and expressing readiness to take part with other countries, particularly concerned, in an examination of the possibility of establishing a collective defence system in Southeast Asia within the framework of the United Nations Charter.²

² Voir/See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXX, No. 774, April 26, 1954, p. 622.

Indian Attitude

10. No statement of Indian views on the United States proposal as yet. However, it is quite possible that this subject will come up for discussion at the meeting of South Asian Prime Ministers at Colombo on April 28. India will probably regard this initiative as a further cutting into the area in which it hoped that a measure of neutrality might be preserved.

Canadian Attitude

11. A number of approaches to this problem are suggested in the following paragraphs:

(a) United Nations Aspect. Canada could not be committed to action in Indochina or Southeast Asia unless the United Nations were seized of the problem. The Warning Declaration issued at the time of the Armistice in Korea in July 1953 does not commit us to take action.³ It may be that Canada could make a helpful contribution by exploring with other governments concerned ways in which United Nations might be brought into Indochina, possibly by sending an observation commission as in the Balkans.

(b) Pacific Security Pact Aspect. It will be desirable to bear in mind public statements of the Canadian position in respect to proposals for a Pacific Security Pact. The proposed grouping seems to be a regional one for Southeast Asia and the Southwest Pacific. Canada has not been asked to participate. The United States is not likely to propose broadening the membership at this time as this would bring in the difficult problems of Chinese Nationalist and Japanese membership.

(c) SEA Regional Security Aspect. Last year it was decided that Canada should not seek to participate closely in the work of the Five Power Staff Agency charged with the study of strategy and the organization of security in South-east Asia. It would be consistent for us to indicate that we have no immediate interest in any proposed regional military coordination arrangements that might arise from the Dulles proposal, but would be glad to be kept generally informed.

(d) NATO Aspect. About a year and a half ago NATO officially took cognizance of France's heavy commitments in Indochina. It might be appropriate for the Council to review the Indochina situation again in the light of more recent developments. It is possible that the United States, France or the United Kingdom might raise this subject at the forthcoming Council meeting.

(e) Canadian Arms Aid Aspect. If it is considered that some display of Canadian concern should be shown one suggestion that might be considered is removal of restrictions on the shipment to Indochina of military matériel supplied France under the Mutual Aid Act which is now supposed to be used only in the NAT area.⁴

UNITED STATES INITIATIVE ON INDO-CHINA

I would like to suggest that, when our attitude toward the current United States initiative on Indochina is being studied, consideration might be given to the probable attitude of India and some other Asian countries.

2. As you know, it has been understood for some time between the Indians and ourselves that, when considering Asian questions which are important to India, we will try to take into account the Indian point of view. Our attitude during the past few years, on such question as Korea and communism in Asia has increased Indian confidence in Canada as a country which, while sharing the interests of the West, understands and values the Asian point of view. In spite of Mr. Krishna Menon's acerbic judgments, I doubt if our difference with India over the convening of the Assembly to deal with Korea,⁵ or our attitude toward United States military aid to Pakistan,⁶ has seriously diminished this confidence. It is clear, too, that in India the Prime Minister, while he praised the qualities of the American people and defended the motives of the United States Government, at the same time impressed Indians with the sympathetic and constructive nature of the Canadian approach to a number of Asian problems.

3. One of these problems was the question of Indochina. The Prime Minister's ready support of Mr. Nehru's appeal for a cease fire greatly pleased the Indians and left the impression that Canada favours the plan to attempt a negotiated settlement at Geneva.⁷ I realize that, both before Mr. Dulles made his recent statements and since that time, we have made it clear that the Indochinese problem is not one in which we are immediately concerned; and, of course, the Prime Minister's views on Indochina were not deliberately stated but were made in response to questions at a press conference. Nevertheless, if we were to associate ourselves with an arrangement which the Indians might feel would remove any chance of success at Geneva, or which they would regard as likely to prolong the war and increase the danger of further outside participation, we might forfeit some of the Indian goodwill which the Prime Minister's remarks created.

2. Perhaps we should also consider the extent to which we would wish to appear to underwrite broad United States aims in Asia. If, as James Reston suggested in the New York Times on March 30, Mr. Dulles' proposals are part of a broader United States effort to make Mr. Nehru and some other Asian leaders realize the threat of expansionist communism and "get off the fence", the proposals would seriously disturb these leaders. While United States military aid to Pakistan had a special sting for the Indians because of Indo-Pakistan relations, the suggestion that it was partly calculated to bring India into line also troubled the Indians. Mr. Nehru, it seems, has not accepted this interpretation, but many influential Indians have. Relations between the United States and India, if the United States should think it worth while to make the effort, would recover a good deal of their former cordiality; I think there is now some danger of a further setback as a result of the present United States initiative on Indochina.

⁷ Voir/See Globe and Mail, February 25, 1954.

3. Perhaps this is a consideration which we would wish to have in mind when formulating our own attitude toward the United States proposals. The Prime Minister's defense of the United States in India was on general grounds and even his comments on United States military aid to Pakistan fell short of expressing a judgment on the merits of this move.⁸ Maintenance of our present non-committal attitude on the Dulles proposals for Indochina could be consistent with this general approach toward United States policy: I would hope that we would not find it necessary to go further. Indeed, while we could hardly be expected to interfere with any defensive arrangements which countries with interests in South-East Asia should see fit to make under United States leadership, the distaste we have often displayed for an indiscriminate crusade against communism in Asia, and the broad sympathy the Prime Minister displayed in Asia for moves designed to pacify the area, might well lead the Indians to expect us to speak out against such doubtful appeals as that of Mr. Dulles for united action against the introduction of communism into Indochina "by whatever means."

4. The possibility of another public airing of United States and Indian differences over Asian security is increased by the fact that, at about the time the Geneva Conference opens, the Prime Ministers of India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Indonesia and Burma will be holding a conference in Colombo. The extent to which United States proposals on Indochina draw fire at this conference will no doubt depend partly on the nature of the arrangements which are ultimately worked out. The presence of Pakistan at the conference and the fact that it has evidently been agreed that any questions with respect to which serious differences exist among the participants will not be discussed, may help to prevent any extreme reaction of a joint character against the United States initiative.

5. However, Mr. Nehru has already made it clear that he intends to make an effort at the conference to encourage Asian countries to use their influence to ameliorate the conflict between communist and anti-communist countries, in the hope that the chances of general war may be lessened. The present atmosphere is such that an effort of this kind might be inevitably directed more against the United States than against the communist countries. United States hydrogen bomb explosions in the Pacific have upset Asian opinion in a way that Russian explosions have not; and with respect to Indochina, the communists have so far done nothing to disturb Asians except to step up their offensive, whereas the Americans are being accused

(at least by the Russians) of planning to circumvent the Geneva negotiations and to prolong the war. Moreover, India and other Asian "neutrals" have been excluded from the Geneva Conference. Under these circumstances it would be remarkable if the Colombo Conference did not give rise to some expressions of anxiety about Western policy.

6. Against this it is necessary to keep in mind that so far we have heard of no strong Indian reaction to Mr. Dulles' Indochina proposals, that the Indian Government (perhaps as distinct from the Indian public) is probably already conditioned to expect very little from the Geneva Conference, and that Mr. Nehru's concern is not to promote anti-Americanism in Asia but rather to avert an all-out conflict in Asia between the communists and those opposed to them. Until the precise nature of Mr. Dulles' proposals become clearer it will be difficult to assess the Indian reaction accurately; and so far as we are without benefit of advice from New Delhi on this point.

7. As I understand the question of an attitude toward Mr. Dulles' proposals is now being studied I feel I should nevertheless suggest that consideration be given to the above points. This memorandum is not, of course, intended to do more than assess the problem from the point of view of our relations with India and like-minded Asian countries. To sum up, if Mr. Dulles' proposals result in nothing more than a stiffening of the French will to fight on if necessary, and to avoid any disastrous concessions at Geneva, a non-committal attitude on our part would probably do no damage to these relations, particularly if the French were also to concede full sovereignty to the Associated States. If something more than this should result from Mr. Dulles' proposals an ideal course, from the point of view of our relations with India, would be some sort of effort, either at Geneva or otherwise, to advise the Americans against the undesirable effects of a policy based on adamant opposition to communism wherever it appears, or has already appeared, in Asia. In this case I would suggest that the very least we should do to preserve the confidence of the "uncommitted" Asian countries would be to maintain a non-committal attitude.⁹

GENEVA CONFERENCE

On 14th April, Krishna Menon called on me for an hour's talk. He had, previously that day, had similar talks with French diplomats and the United Kingdom and Australian High Commissioners. I have subsequently compared notes with the first two. Menon said he was making his call at the request of the Prime Minister and that the Prime Minister would probably make a public statement next week on Indo-China in which he would not, repeat not, put forward a final solution but would attempt to make constructive suggestions on how a solution might be reached. The French were told the statement would not be aimed against them. The British think the Prime Minister will state India's firm opposition to the proposal for "united action" and the creation of a Pacific security organization. Menon hopes to let us have in advance a summary of the statement.

2. It seems clear that India is deeply disturbed by recent developments. The bomb explosion and the Dulles threat are interpreted here as indicating that the United States is not willing at this time to seek a peaceful solution of the Indo-Chinese problem.¹⁰ The Indians think that the Chinese will not overawed by the threat but will match increased western assistance to Vietnam with increased Chinese assistance to Viet-Minh with the consequent risk of an intensification and extension of the fighting. Many arguments they used against the United States military assistance to Pakistan apply in their mind with even greater force to the proposed Pacific security organization: the return of western domination to Asia thinly disguised as an alliance between the western countries and two or three Asian satellites; the shrinkage of the peace area; the risk of provoking dangerous Soviet and Chinese counter-measures. The Indians have never denied that their national security would be endangered by Chinese domination of South-East Asia but they consider [it unlikely] that the Chinese wish to go in for military adventures in that area and that the way to prevent domination is to give independence and economic assistance.

3. It seems to me that the main subject discussion at the Colombo Conference of the Five Prime Ministers may be developments in Indo-China. Perhaps India will seek support for whatever statement the Prime Minister makes next week.

4. The Indian Ministry of External Affairs state that they have received no indication of what proposals for settlement in Korea and Indo-China the Chinese are likely to make at Geneva. My impression, which is shared by my United Kingdom and French colleagues, is that this is in fact the case. One of Thimayya's senior advisers in Korea considers that the Chinese will open the discussions on Korea with a violent attack on the United States for the release of prisoners and for facilitating their conscription by Formosa and South Korea.

INDO-CHINA: DULLES PROPOSALS

This morning, April 17th, the Australian and New Zealand Ambassadors and I were asked to see the Under-Secretary of State to hear from him a report of the Secretary's conversations in London and Paris. Livingston Merchant who accompanied Mr. Dulles, was with Bedell Smith, and I have just returned after an hour with them.

2. Merchant gave the account of the meetings. He began by saying that the Secretary was "extremely satisfied" with the results of his talks with both Mr. Eden and M. Bidault. In particular Dulles had been able to correct the impression (which had existed in certain quarters) that what the United States Government had in mind was some sort of an "ultimatum" to Communist China.

3. Dulles had explained to Eden the United States appreciation of the grave military situation in Indo-China. The British had been inclined to regard the local situation with less apprehension, but Merchant thought that they were convinced on this point.

4. In any event, after these preliminary explanations, the United Kingdom Government quickly accepted the proposal that immediate consideration be given to some form of association by the nations immediately concerned in Southeast Asia, with the object of preventing further Communist encroachments. Apparently there was no disposition in London (nor in Paris) to dispute the general American proposition that the fall of Indo-China would endanger the position not only in Southeast Asia, but eventually in Asia as a whole. The suggestion for something approaching a "Southeast Asian NATO" came from the United Kingdom.

5. In Paris, Dulles also found a sympathetic response from Bidault to the proposition that collective action was called for. And Bidault (whom the Americans found to be calm and determined) agreed that conversations between the governments directly concerned should get under way immediately. In fact it was agreed that a Working Group should be set up in Washington, and Spender told me this morning that they are to begin their work on Tuesday next, April 20th.

6. There was apparently no suggestion in London or Paris that any "declaration" should be made. The communiqués issued in each place were very carefully considered and the form of any association of Southeast Asian powers which may emerge is still imprecise.¹¹ There is, however, no doubt that the Americans are looking to military undertakings from their associates. But in this respect I believe that no (repeat no) commitments have yet been made.

7. Bedell Smith admitted frankly that the "colonial" aspect of the struggle in Indo-China constituted a serious problem, particularly in terms of world opinion. Laos is apparently satisfied to remain within the French Union on conditions now agreed. No settlement has yet been made, however, with respect to Viet Nam and Cambodia. Bidault assured Dulles that these governments would be given freedom of choice. All of us agreed that the French would have to take early steps to set at rest the prevalent suspicion that they were unwilling to let go. You may expect this aspect of the situation to be in the forefront of the discussions in Washington.

8. There was, I think, no significance to the fact that I was asked to attend with Spender and Munro this morning, other than merely to save time for all concerned. In any event I was able to slip in several second persons plural (referring to those who would participate in the proposed Regional Group) without making a point of the distinction in the Canadian role at this morning's meeting.

9. I shall send a separate message concerning the Geneva Conference.†

2. With Casey I had a talk this morning (April 24) with Eden, who was very worried about Indo-Chinese developments. This afternoon he, Eden, saw Dulles and Admiral Radford, who told him that the situation in Indo-China had deteriorated at Dien Bien Phu and would likely soon deteriorate elsewhere to a point that it could only be saved by United States intervention, in which they hoped the United Kingdom would join. They had drafted a letter in which the French would request such intervention which would take the form of air action against Communist lines of communication to Dien Bien Phu, and, if necessary, communications in China itself. They hoped the United Kingdom could join in such air action. A staff mission might also move into the Delta Area, merely to advise and invigorate, by strong direction, Vietnam and French operations there.

3. Eden said that the United Kingdom had no air forces in the area which might be used but, in any event, he had the gravest doubts as to the wisdom and effectiveness of any such intervention, especially on the eve of the Geneva and Colombo Conferences. He also refused flatly to accept a viewpoint of Dulles that the recent London declaration committed the United Kingdom to co-operate.

4. Eden and his advisors here feel that the proposed intervention would not save the situation in Indo-China but might, on the other hand, provoke strong retaliation by the Chinese on the ground. They were not reassured by Radford's assurance that American intelligence reports indicated that such a Chinese reaction was unlikely.

5. Later Eden and Dulles saw Bidault, who, while doubtful of the United States appreciation and proposed action, was inclined to be non-committal as he was not sure of the views of his colleagues, except Laniel, whom he felt would not be likely to welcome the United States proposal.

6. Mr. Eden has now flown to London to consult Sir Winston Churchill and will go from there to Geneva tomorrow evening.

7. Denis Allen of the Foreign Office, for Mr. Eden, has given me the above information, and said the Foreign Secretary would welcome my views.

8. I said that my first reaction was the same as that of Mr. Eden, that the proposal seemed unwise, not likely to accomplish the purpose desired, and might, indeed, misfire with disastrous results. I hoped that the Americans would have second thoughts. I added that it would be deplorable if the United States decided to "go it alone", and if an open and deep disagreement developed on an issue so explosive with consequences so far-reaching.

9. I hope that Sir Winston Churchill will be willing and able to get in touch with President Eisenhower direct, as a result of which the situation might become less dangerous than it seems to be at the moment.

10. Casey's views are similar to mine.

11. I am leaving for Geneva in the morning and hope to see Eden and the Americans there tomorrow evening. Ends.

On arrival at Geneva I saw Casey, who earlier in the day had a talk with Dulles, and Walter Robertson, the result of which was somewhat surprising in view of the report we had received about Dulles' Saturday discussion with Eden which has already been reported to you. Casey had sent a report of that earlier discussion to his government along the lines of mine so he was surprised and confused to hear Dulles say yesterday that the request for 'massive air strikes' had come from the French and that before the United States could reply it would first, have to secure Congressional approval, second, the co-operation of Commonwealth countries and third, the assurance that full independence had been given the associated states. In other words, Dulles is now apparently suggesting that the initiative in this matter of intervention was coming from the French. I will try to get this confusion cleared up today when I hope to see both Dulles and Eden. It may result from instructions from the President in Washington checking the earlier proposals of Dulles and Radford. In any event, it is most unfortunate that there should be confusion and uncertainty on a matter of such very great importance.

2. Dulles confirmed to Casey that he had been urging the French to continue their resistance in Indo-China whether Dien Bien Phu fell or not. He had also seen Laniel Saturday night at 7 o'clock for the same purpose but did not believe he had made much impression on Laniel's mind. If the Laniel Government falls, Dulles thinks that it will be replaced by a Mendes-France Government committed in advance to a virtual abandonment of Indo-China.

3. Dulles told Casey that if only the French could hold on additional help would be coming from the United States, including an American Military Mission, but all this would take some weeks. Dulles added that if international intervention takes place in Indo-China later there is a good chance that Pakistan, Thailand, the Philippines, Formosa and Japan would applaud it while even Burma and Indonesia would not be opposed. India however he knew would be hostile.

4. Contrary to the reports we received Saturday Dulles told Casey yesterday that the United States would not bomb Communist China unless China came in openly.

5. You will appreciate that this message conflicts in some respect with the Saturday one but I hope to have this particular conflict at least resolved shortly.

6. Canadian Delegation are all here and comfortably installed at the Paix.

Projet de déclaration du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Draft Statement by Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa, April 27, 1954]

CANADIAN POSITION ON UNITED ACTION IN INDOCHINA

In the past few weeks the Government of the United States has discussed with the governments of a number of States having direct interests in Southeast Asia the problems arising out of the increased campaign waged in Indochina by the Communist Vietminh forces against the forces of France and of the legitimate governments of the associated states. The Canadian Government has been kept fully informed of those discussions. It appreciates the importance of encouraging national and independent governments in Indochina as well as the strategic significance of that area in the protection of Southeast Asia against Communist imperialism. Other discussions between the governments directly concerned are to be held to determine whether and how collective action could effectively achieve the object I have indicated. I anticipate that we would continue to be informed as these discussions proceed. The Government will of course keep the House informed of further developments.

While the question at issue concerns in general the whole free world, Canada's interests in Southeast Asia are not as direct as those of the States presently concerned in the discussions I have mentioned, and there are no Canadian commitments in this regard.

The Prime Minister stated in the House on April 26 in answer to a question from the Honourable Member for Kamloops (Mr. E.D. Fulton) that Canadian obligations which might involve military action in the east were limited to what we were doing under the aegis of the United Nations — that is in Korea. The Prime Minister said that the Government was not going to involve Canada in matters that might require military action for their implementation without making a full disclosure to Parliament and a recommendation as a consequence of that disclosure. He said that he would not like to commit the Government to making any recommendation to Parliament at this time to become directly involved in what is taking place in Indochina.¹³

Following from Minister, Begins: After further talks with Eden and examining his reports of various recent conversations the situation is now reasonably clear though not any more encouraging in regard to recent United States initiative to assist the French in Indo-China. The sequence of events seems to be as follows:

When Eden saw Dulles and Radford, Saturday, April 24, Dulles told him that he felt that there was no chance of keeping the French in the fight unless they knew that the Americans would do what they could within presidential constitutional authority to join them in that fight. The French, according to Dulles had made it clear to him (though they had not taken the same line with Eden) that it was not enough for them to secure an assurance of help in defending the rest of Indo-China if Dien fell. The United States must participate in an air strike in the battle for the fortress itself. Dulles told Eden that he had replied (though his views on this matter seem to have been modified later, at least in respect of (2) below) that help of this kind was impossible because:

(1) the President had not the power to act with the necessary speed as Congress would have to approve and

(2) that even General Navarre felt that no intervention of this kind could save the fortress.

2. Dulles, however, felt that the United Kingdom and the United States should now give the French a definite assurance that they would join in the defence of Indo-China even if Dien fell and that this might keep the French in the fight. He indicated that the United States would be willing to give such an assurance if the United Kingdom would join in it and providing Congress approved.

3. Eden then asked what kind of measures would be contemplated to save Indo-China. Admiral Radford then intervened to say that immediate military intervention would be necessary to hold the French position and that the United Kingdom part might be the despatch of RAF units into Tongking and the use of an aircraft carrier if there was one in the area (which there isn't). Radford went on to give his views that when Dien fell the whole military position would get out of control in a few days; there would be riots in Saigon and Hanoi and the population would likely turn against the French. The only way to prevent this was to show that France now had powerful allies in the fight. This might have the necessary psychological effect. It involved a United States share in the planning of the high command, in the training of Vietnam troops, and the removal of Navarre.

4. Eden replied that the French had not given the British such a desperate picture either of the situation at Dien or in Indo-China as a whole. He asked whether the United States really thought that air intervention could be decisive to alter the situation and if they had considered either its effect on world opinion or the Chinese reaction to it. Had the Americans forgotten the Russo-Chinese alliance or that we might be heading in the direction of World War III?

5. Admiral Radford replied that he did not think the Chinese would or could intervene in Indo-China and that they could be held by the collective action of the free nations having vital interests in this area.

6. After this, the meeting took place with Bidault. Dulles said that if the French were willing to continue the war after the fall of Dien, the United States would urgently try to organize the defence of the entire region as agreed in the communiqués issued in London and Paris last week. Could they count on French help?

7. Bidault hesitated as he felt that the fall of Dien might be decisive both in Indo-China and in Paris. His own policy was to fight on but he was not certain of the government or public opinion.

8. At this point, Dulles produced the draft letter to Bidault which has subsequently caused so much confusion in its initiation and interpretation due largely to the fact that the Americans consider it a reply to a previous communication of the French asking for help and not an initiation of their own. This letter included the following paragraph which seemed to contradict some of Admiral Radford's ideas:

"No air strike could possibly save Dien now even if United States constitutional procedure authorized it but they would try to obtain special powers for the President to move ground forces into Indo-China and thus internationalize the struggle against Communism in Indo-China and protect the whole South-Eastern region of Asia".

9. They would send such a letter to the French if desired and if the United Kingdom would participate.

10. Bidault again hesitated after reading this letter but then approved of its despatch. Eden realized at once that he was in a very difficult position but he did immediately object to Dulles' suggestion that action of the kind proposed could be based on the communiqué issued last week from London.

11. Eden then decided to go to London but before he left Paris Maurice Schumann rang him up and said that both Laniel and Bidault urged the United Kingdom to join in the procedure suggested in the Dulles letter.

12. Eden saw Sir Winston Churchill Sunday night at Chequers and the Cabinet met next morning. They agreed on instructions to the Foreign Secretary. I have the text of these but gather from your telegram No. 3, that Earncliffe has shown them to you. They amount of course to a rejection of what had by that time become the Franco-American proposals. As of this afternoon Eden had not shown them to Dulles.

13. While lunching yesterday at the Carleton Club with the Prime Minister (he said that neither of them had been there for ten years) Eden was visited by Massigli who said that Bidault had instructed him to see Eden at once and press urgently for quick action re Mr. Dulles' request. The background of Massigli's intervention irritated Eden. It was as follows. Bedell Smith in Washington saw Bonnet Saturday evening and indicated that they might be able to get quick congressional approval if the Dulles letter could be agreed on at once by the governments concerned. Bedell Smith therefore asked the French Government to press the United Kingdom to agree to a declaration of intention based on this letter proclaiming the common will of the signatories:

- (a) to stop the expansion of Communism in South-East Asia and
- (b) to use "eventual military force" to this end.

14. Eden gave Massigli no satisfaction. The French Ambassador said he understood the United Kingdom difficulties but added "the Americans having declared that their willingness to act was dependent on the United Kingdom attitude, he trusted that the United Kingdom would consider the effect on French opinion and elsewhere of its refusal". Eden, however, was firm that action before the Geneva conference would be premature and dangerous. He could not even agree that Sir Roger Makins could participate in drafting such a declaration of intention without commitment.

15. Meanwhile, Bidault has replied to Dulles' letter as follows:

"The view of our military experts which has been confirmed this very day by a high ranking officer who has landed at Dien Bien Phu and who knows the ground well is that mass intervention by American aircraft could still save the garrison. It is also the opinion of our High Command that in order to attack the reduced perimeter of the fortress the Viet Minh have mustered an exceptional concentration of troops and equipment and have thrown in the major part of their fighting formations. This concentration of Viet Minh power which has now taken place for the first time affords us an opportunity which may well never recur to destroy by air action a high proportion of the enemy's forces. Moreover, such action taking place as it would at the very beginning of the rainy season might interrupt the supply facilities to such an extent as to endanger the remainder of these troops.

It is thus not impossible that a situation which is at present difficult might be turned into a decisive blow against the Viet Minh."

16. Bidault met Eden at Orly airport last evening as he was flying to Geneva, and Eden read him the pertinent parts of the Cabinet instruction which in effect rejected the Franco-American proposal. He said that Bidault took this very well; did not even seem particularly surprised. He, Bidault, was however irritated because Admiral Radford seemed to give military information to the French on the efficacy of an air strike contrary to what he had told the British and also because the Americans had now leaked the news that France had asked for air help when they felt that the initiative had come from the Americans themselves. Bidault was calm and reasonable but gravely perturbed by the situation and told Eden that France was "on the edge of the slope both militarily in Indo-China and politically in Paris". Eden then said that all of his military advisers believed that an air strike at Dien Bien Phu would not appreciably affect the situation. They therefore, felt that they were being asked to undertake an enterprise of gravest consequences which they knew could not succeed. Eden's impression is that Bidault not only understood, but personally accepted his conclusion. But Bidault said he must take account of what Admiral Radford's views now were and of advice given by the French military.

17. The British are very unhappy over developments as they feel that they are being manoeuvred into a position where the collapse of the situation in Indo-China may be blamed by the French on the absence of Allied military help and that the Americans will blame this on British timidity and hesitation. I feel, however, that the British position is absolutely sound and both Casey and Webb agree, though Casey is particularly disturbed at the possibility of an American rebuff and a breach with Great Britain which might cause the United States to withdraw its interest from the whole South East Asian area.

18. I shall maintain the position that we are not directly involved in this matter at all but will do what I can to impress on the Americans the difficulty of the British position and the strength of the British arguments against the Dulles proposals which now are also French proposals. There is a combination, as I see it, of rashness and desperation in these proposals; that they would do little to help the French or Indo-China and might even extend and intensify the present conflict. I gather that this view is supported by United Kingdom military opinion.

INDO-CHINA

Casey, Webb and I saw Eden again this morning, who reported to us on recent conversations with Bidault and Dulles, and on Bidault's talk with Molotov, regarding Indo-China. A further report on these developments will follow.

2. Meanwhile, it now seems pretty clear that the Indo-Chinese conference at least in its first stages, will be confined in its membership to the Big Four, Communist China and the three Indo-Chinese states. Vietminh will probably be associated with it but in some way which will differentiate its status from that of the Indo-Chinese Governments. Eden said there is little possibility of any additional membership at this time. Casey and Webb are quite satisfied, as they realize that the best chance of some success is to keep representation at this stage to a minimum.

3. The question of Canadian membership is, therefore, a completely academic one, and will probably remain so. I told Eden that we were not surprised or concerned at this, but were greatly interested in the Indo-Chinese phase of the conference, and would be glad to be of any assistance possible. In the discussions which will be going on to this end, frequent discussions with Eden and as occasion offers with the Americans, will give us an opportunity to express any views that we might have without becoming directly involved.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

At a meeting of Commonwealth Foreign Ministers on April 30 Mr. Eden reported on conversations held during the day with Mr. Dulles, with Mr. Bidault and conversations with Mr. Molotov and Mr. Chou En Lai at lunch.

*Dulles Disappointed with Conference*¹⁴

2. Dulles had complained that he had been left almost alone in the stand he had taken in the conference. Except for Mr. Casey's statement, which dealt with only a few of the many Communist charges against the U.S.A., no other Commonwealth or European Minister had risen to his support or to answer the accusations that the United States was Imperialist and had designs to become a colonial power in Asia. Eden replied to him that the British were accustomed to such charges over a long period of years and paid little attention to them. He felt there was nothing to be gained by repeating what had already been said so well by Dulles and Casey. It was time now to get down to the business of the conference. He was quite prepared, however, to participate in the general debate if the Sixteen could agree on positive proposals which he could put forward. He was not enthusiastic about giving support to the position taken by Dulles on such issues as elections only for the North and not for all-Korea.

3. I also expressed my willingness to participate in the general debate, if it was felt that we could make any contribution in support of a positive plan about which we could be somewhat more enthusiastic than the one which had been suggested so far. It was hoped that the Committee of Nine out of the Sixteen would be able to agree very soon upon some positive proposals in respect to elections throughout Korea under United Nations or international supervision and "phased" withdrawal of troops. The Americans had indicated to me their support of such proposals.

Southeast Asia Organization

4. Dulles told Eden that he was greatly disappointed to have to return to the United States to report that the United Kingdom had opposed his plan for an organization in Southeast Asia similar to NATO. He feared public reaction in the United States would be unfavourable. Eden told him emphatically that the United Kingdom was not opposed to such an organization if it were organized under circumstances similar to those under which NATO had been organized, that is a defensive pact organized during peace time. The situation in Southeast Asia with fighting going on in Indo-China was totally different and to form a pact at this time could only be for the purpose of engaging in war in Indo-China in support of the French. The United Kingdom was opposed to such action. Dulles expressed dissatisfaction with the manner in which Radford had presented the case and was inclined to blame him for the position taken by the United Kingdom in this matter. Eden assured him, however, that Radford had not been the main factor in the decision of the United Kingdom. Eden then informed us that he was still confident that intervention now by the United Kingdom and the United States in Indo-China would only dangerously aggravate the situation.

Mechanism for Negotiation on Korea

5. When Eden informed Dulles that he had accepted an invitation to lunch with Molotov and Chou En Lai, Dulles requested him to sound out the Communists regarding suitable mechanism for negotiations as soon as the general debate was over. Dulles suggested that the Communists might accept Prince Wan as a mediator and contact man between separate meetings to be held by each side. This would prevent the embarrassment of having to negotiate directly with the Chinese Communists. Eden discussed plans with Molotov and Chou En Lai. They agreed to set up a small group consisting of the four great powers, China and the two Koreas which would get down to business on about Tuesday of next week. (It was subsequently decided to hold the first meeting on May 1).

British-Chinese Relations

6. When Chou En Lai referred to British recognition of his Government Eden reminded him that China had not recognized the United Kingdom. Chou replied bluntly that the United Kingdom had voted against China in the United Nations. When he glossed over the fact that the British had a Chargé in Peking Eden reminded him that they had a man in Peking by the name of Trevelyan who had been consistently ignored by the Peking Government. (Mr. Trevelyan informed us that prior to leaving Peking for the conference he had been entertained at dinner by the Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs, which was a regular proceeding for all diplomats in Peking with whom diplomatic relations were about to be established). When Chou complained bitterly of United States treatment of China Eden assured him that the United States had no designs on China and suggested that it might be useful for him to obtain my opinion in this respect as a representative of the closest neighbour of the United States. Chou thought that there were representatives there who were opposed to a settlement in Indo-China. Eden asked if he meant the United Kingdom. He replied "no", but he would give Eden no satisfaction as to whom he meant. Eden's comment on Chou, as a result of his first meeting, was that Chou was tough and baffling. Chou had not been very forthcoming regarding negotiations in Indo-China, but Molotov seemed willing to facilitate arrangements which would set up machinery for negotiations.

Indo-China

7. In conversations with Bidault, Eden had gained the impression that Bidault had succeeded in reaching agreement with Molotov that the four great powers, China, the three associated states and the Viet-Minh would be invited to participate in the conference to reach some settlement. There is no thought any longer of a mere cease-fire, only a full fledged armistice is acceptable. Bidault seems to have backed away from the idea of a division of Indo-China.

8. I referred to the possibility of inviting a representative from the recent Colombo Conference to Geneva, if that conference succeeds in evolving proposals which might form a basis for negotiations. It would be preferable that either a Pakistani or a Ceylonese should represent the South Asian nations which had participated in the Colombo Conference. Eden took interest in this idea and agreed that this matter should be given serious consideration as soon as we obtain information about the proposals agreed upon in Colombo.

9. Bidault has expressed a strong desire to have a President chosen from outside of the nine powers to preside over the meetings of the Nine in negotiations on Indo-China.

Formosa

10. Eden expressed considerable concern regarding a statement made by Dulles about American intentions respecting Formosa. Dulles had suggested the possibility of a treaty of alliance with the Nationalist Chinese in Formosa. Eden felt that this suggestion may have been intended to bring pressure upon the United Kingdom to be more forthcoming in their attitude towards a Southeast Asia organization and requested us to treat the matter very confidentially.

MR. NEHRU'S PROPOSALS

At the request of the Minister in Geneva, we should be grateful if you were to convey to Pillai at the first suitable opportunity an expression of our sympathetic interest in Prime Minister Nehru's thoughtful suggestions on Indochina, which formed the basis for the Colombo conference discussions on the subject.¹⁵

2. In approaching Pillai on his behalf, the Minister has suggested that at this stage it might be best to be non-committal in your remarks, mentioning that we are not primary participants in Southeast Asian affairs, but that nonetheless we have studied Mr. Nehru's proposals seriously and expect to give the same careful consideration to their offspring from Colombo. You could use in this connection the extracts from the Minister's speech at Geneva¹⁶ which have been repeated to you.

3. Our preliminary comments on Mr. Nehru's proposals went forward to the Minister on April 30.† A copy is being sent to you by courier.

4. Briefly, our general comments are as follows: While we welcome his proposals for their evidently sincere intention to contribute toward a solution in Indochina, their usefulness and acceptability at this time clearly depend on an accurate assessment of the military situation. If the Franco-Vietnamese military situation can be improved, then we think that the Canadian delegation at Geneva should not now suggest to those more immediately concerned with the problem that a study be made of the Indian proposals. If, however, the military situation is likely to deteriorate seriously, we think it would be worthwhile to suggest careful and sympathetic consideration of Mr. Nehru's proposals.

5. The terms of a cease-fire agreement and its supervision seem to us to be of fundamental importance in the fluid type of war being fought in Indochina. Vietminh guerilla infiltrations, coupled with the atmosphere of political distrust which prevails throughout Indochina, made Mr. Nehru's initiative particularly interesting, especially if, as seems possible, India would be willing to assume responsibility for supervising a cease-fire. While keeping in mind the desirability of not excluding non-Asians from sharing these responsibilities, we can see definite advantages to an arrangement whereby the Indians (and possibly other Colombo powers) would assume a large measure of responsibility in the policing of a cease-fire in Indochina.

6. If the Indians are willing to share the responsibility for policing a cease-fire, we think that Mr. Nehru's suggestions should be thoroughly and sympathetically explored at the appropriate stage. It may be that the appropriate stage would not be reached until efforts at direct settlement demonstrated the need for good offices and the policing of a cease-fire.

7. We have not considered at this time the more difficult, but less immediate, problem of what arrangements might be worked out in a political settlement.

8. We should be grateful if, for the present, you would consider these comments as for your information only and not for discussion with the Indians or with representatives of other friendly governments.

SECRET AND PERSONAL

Geneva, May 6, 1954

My dear Mr. St. Laurent,

You will have gathered from the official communications received from Paris and Geneva, that we have been having a busy time at a confusing and somewhat discouraging conference.

So far as the NATO meeting was concerned, that went off quite satisfactorily,¹⁷ but even in Paris, it was not NATO so much as Indochinese and Asian developments that engaged the major share of the attention of all who were there.

I do not need to go into the events of that Paris weekend, which have been reported fully, if not clearly (the situation did not make possible much clarity). I felt then, and my feeling has since been confirmed, that the United Kingdom saved the French and the Americans from making serious mistakes, which, on the French side, were prompted by desperation, and on the American by impatience. Domestic political considerations, of course, were important on both sides. It is particularly unfortunate that at this critical moment the French Government should be so weak, and the American Government so divided.

Since arriving in Geneva, the United Kingdom, through Mr. Eden, has continued its useful role as catalyst, mediator, and counsellor. At times they have irritated both the French and, more particularly, the Americans, but that was bound to be the case in the circumstances.

One aspect of the Indochinese talks (they have all as yet been quite informal, because no conference has been set up) which has, I know, been worrying you in Ottawa, has been Canada's relationship to them. In any discussions I have had here, I have tried to avoid indifference, on the one hand, and commitments on the other.

We have, however, through our close contacts with the Americans and the British, been kept completely informed of everything that has been going on, and, indeed, have taken part in a good many of the preliminary and informal discussions. At the same time, I would repeat that it has been made clear to all concerned that we have not, and do not expect to have, any special obligation in respect of Indochina or any special claim or desire to be included in the formal Indochinese Conference. Our position in this regard is made easier by the present decision to confine the membership of that conference to the Big Four and the Governments of Indochina, Vietminh and Communist China.

In the above circumstances, it would be unrealistic and absurd for us to expect an invitation to the Indochina Conference. Even the neighbouring states will not be formal participants. The reason for our omission should, I think, be apparent to Mr. Drew, Mr. Howard Green, or the Toronto Globe and Mail. At the same time, our close association with informal discussions here should remove any impression that we are aloof and not interested.

We certainly should be interested, because if the Indochinese question goes very wrong, serious and widespread conflict might result, from whose consequences we would not be able to escape. Even if that ultimate tragic contingency did not result, there is a real danger of serious division between the United Kingdom and United States over this matter. In talks I have had I have kept this in mind, and once or twice suggested to both sides its danger, and ways of avoiding it in respect of specific suggestions made by one side (say the United States) which would be obviously unwelcome to the other.

For these reasons, I have thought it wise to keep in as close but "non-committal" touch as possible with developments.

On the substance of the Indochinese matter, everyone feels depressed and frustrated; a feeling derived from the military situation in Indochina, from weakness and indecision in Paris, and divided counsels and confusing tactics in Washington. On one matter we find ourselves in close understanding and agreement with the United Kingdom, namely, that the conflict should not be extended or prematurely or partially internationalized, and that other Asian states should be somehow brought into a closer association with the problem. That is why Mr. Eden intervened at the Colombo meeting with good results. It is also why I mentioned the communiqué from that meeting in my statement Tuesday. Neither the French nor the Americans are enamoured of the association of countries like India or Burma or Indonesia with Indochinese developments, but they are less opposed to it now than they were a fortnight ago.

Another difficulty is our inability to secure from the French delegation any information re concrete plans for a settlement which they may have in mind. I suspect that they will advocate some form of armistice, with a re-arrangement of opposing forces, to be followed by a peace conference, but none of us have any information to confirm this. With the Indochinese Conference to meet very shortly now, the lack of agreement among the Big Three as to what proposals should be put forward, does not augur well for the success of that conference, or for unity on the Western side.

So far as Korea is concerned, the proposals put forward on the Communist side are, of course, impossible to accept, and their attitude has been hard and unyielding. On our side, we have not yet been able to agree on counter-proposals because of the reluctance of the South Korean Government to accept free elections for all Korea, and the reluctance of the United States to push them too hard on this matter, at least at the beginning of the conference. We hope, however, to get this matter cleared up by the end of the week. If the Syngman Rhee Government will not make any concessions, then I suppose the best thing to do — though it is not good — would be to refrain from putting forward any proposals on our side, and to take our stand in opposition to the unacceptable Communist ones. This is not a very satisfactory position, but it is, I think, better than to have open disagreement in our own ranks.

Even if there can be no agreement on a unification of Korea, the conference here could still do a useful job in confirming and improving the armistice arrangements, and thereby making more difficult a resumption of the fighting.

On the less official side of the conference, the most interesting feature has been the complete lack of any kind of contact, social, personal or semi-official, between the American delegates and those from Communist China. Mr. Dulles came and went without having even nodded to Chou En-Lai. This, of course, may be understandable in terms of American domestic politics, but it doesn't seem to make sense here.

At the beginning of the conference it was indicated to me that Chou En-Lai would like to meet me, so I had myself introduced to him one afternoon at the buffet. He was friendly enough, but I have made no move to follow this up. On the other hand, Ronning has been establishing very valuable contacts with members of the Chinese delegation whom he knew personally. They have shown themselves quite friendly and have talked very frankly to him. This has been helpful, I think, and we are passing on any information obtained to the United Kingdom and the Americans. He has also been able to bring up with them the question of Canadians detained in China, of whom there are now only a very few.

Our relations with the Russian delegation are correct, if not close, while we are, of course, on very good terms with all the others.

Unless developments here require a change of plans, I will be going to London next week for the atomic talks and leaving for home around May 21. I will be very happy to be back home, as this is an exhausting and frustrating mission.

Kindest personal regards.

Yours sincerely,
L.B. PEARSON

Repeat London No. 4.

INDO-CHINA

The United Kingdom High Commissioner has shown me in confidence Prime Minister Nehru's reply of May 5th to Eden's message delivered to Commonwealth

Prime Ministers at Colombo Conference. This is an extremely significant document and if you have not, repeat not, already done so I hope that you can get the text from the British without mentioning that I have seen it here.

2. Nehru, in his message, states a major responsibility now rests on India in assisting in a solution of the Indo-China problem.

3. Eden had stated that the United Kingdom is prepared to guarantee a settlement which had a wide backing among all interested parties and had asked whether India would be prepared to be associated in any way with such a guarantee or was there some other action which Asian Commonwealth countries could take.

4. In his reply, Nehru said, in answer to this specific question, that India's present position is that, within limits of its policy of non-alignment and its own resources, India will assist in promoting and maintaining a settlement in Indo-China. India can make no, repeat no, commitments beyond this until India sees the pattern that emerges and until it is known to what extent and to whom guarantee extends and who are the parties of such guarantee. Mr. Nehru went on to make clear that India does not, repeat not, envisage any guarantee that is intended to bring and ensure peace in Indo-China as one in which one group of states enters into an alliance against another group of states.

5. Krishna Menon called on me the afternoon of May 5th. He said that some agency considered neutral by both sides would be required to facilitate a settlement in Indo-China and that the United Nations was ruled out since it was considered by the Russians and the Chinese as unneutral. There were very few countries left in the world which the Russians and the Chinese would consider to be sufficiently neutral which would have a chance of being accepted by the other side and which could send troops to Indo-China. He suggested the list was now reduced pretty much to Mexico, Argentina, Norway or Sweden and India. Such a group might constitute a Neutral Nations Commission for Indo-China. If our side insist on including Pakistan the other side would insist on including Czechoslovakia and Poland. Burma and Indonesia would be considered to be neutral but they were not, repeat not, in a position to send troops to Indo-China.

6. If all parties concerned were to request a group of countries such as this to undertake the responsibility of policing a cease-fire agreement in Indo-China and supervising a non-intervention agreement, and this would mean sending troops, Menon considered India would agree to participate. The responsibility of Neutral Nations Commission might also extend to supervision of free elections.

7. When I saw Pillai the morning of May 6th I gave him your message set forth in paragraph 2 of your telegram No. 141 of May 5th. I went on to report what Menon had said to me. Pillai said that there was no doubt that India would be prepared to play in Indo-China the same sort of role it had played in Korea but he was somewhat afraid that in the correspondence between Eden and Nehru the two countries might be talking at "cross purposes". The impression he gave me was that while India would be prepared to play a role in Indo-China similar to that played in Korea, Eden might misinterpret Nehru's message as being more forthcoming on possibility of India being associated with guaranteeing a settlement than Nehru had intended it to be.

8. I called on Clutterbuck on the afternoon of May 6th and informed him of my talks with Menon and Pillai. Menon had seen him immediately after seeing me but had not, repeat not, spoken to him along the lines on which he had spoken to me. Clutterbuck will attempt to find out from Pillai tomorrow whether Menon's views represent the views of Nehru. He did not, repeat not, understand Pillai's reference to "cross purposes" since it would seem clear that the passage in Nehru's letter quoted above in paragraph 1 refers to a guarantee by China, the Soviet Union, the United States, the United Kingdom and possibly other countries of a peace settlement in Indo-China and does not, repeat not, refer to intermediate subject of a cease-fire agreement and a non-intervention agreement.

9. The following three points were implied by Menon in his talk with me:

(a) A cease-fire agreement and a non-intervention agreement should come into force simultaneously. While purpose of non-intervention agreement would be frustrated if France could ship to Indo-China unlimited supplies of war materials given it by United States, the agreement might provide a very limited agreed flow of war materials from France to French forces in Indo-China to keep stock up to that at the time of the cease-fire.

(b) Since there is no, repeat no, solid front line in Indo-China a cease-fire agreement would probably have to allow for "pockets".

(c) The Chinese and Russians want to end the fighting in Indo-China. Would be reluctant to agree to a division of Viet Nam and if there is a division he thinks that they will want Annam as well as Tongking. They will press for unification of Viet Nam and free elections.

10. Please repeat to Minister.

Ottawa, May 11, 1954

Dear John [Holmes],

The interest which both the Minister and Mr. Eden have shown in keeping in touch with the thinking of the Asian members of the Commonwealth on Indochina and the Southeast Asia question has paid good dividends. The United Kingdom initiative in keeping the Asian members informed and Eden's personal messages to the Prime Ministers seem to have been most favourable in preventing an anti-Western outcry at Colombo and in encouraging a disposition on the part of the Asian members to adopt a more cooperative attitude than we might have expected. More recently, Reid's talk with Pillai following your telegram No. 26 of May 2† proved useful in connection with the other conversations reported in his telegram No. 152 of May 6.

2. I do not think therefore that we could usefully increase our own liaison with the Commonwealth members beyond your continuing what has already been done i.e. our asking our High Commissioners from time to time to speak to the local authorities in accordance with instructions we might receive from the Minister. Subject to the limitations of our communication facilities, the relevant information can in most cases be telegraphed to them for the purpose of liaison.

3. The only other channel, if it is available, would be for the Delegation to establish a connection with any appropriate representatives of the Asian members who might be in Geneva. We know of no such representatives, however, unless by chance Gundevia, the Indian Ambassador has come over from Berne. He is a very capable person.

4. For a number of reasons I would not think of using the Ottawa channel of talking to Baig and Saksena. First, it leaves out the Ceylonese; second, it could not be done very naturally unless they came to see us; third, Saksena is not the most reliable channel; fourth, neither he nor Baig would necessarily reflect the latest thinking of their Government and fifth, it would be difficult to determine what information could properly and usefully be conveyed to them by us.

5. If they were to approach us, however, we would have to use our own judgment as to what we could or should say to them. My inclination would be to state that we have used our High Commissioners as channels and to tell them not much more than we have transmitted to our High Commissioners under your instructions for usage locally. This would cover the ground unless they asked specific questions or were, under instructions, bringing us information for discussion, in which case again we would have to use our own judgment as to how much we should tell, remembering the need to keep reasonably in step with whatever the British are doing. It is an added advantage of leaving the initiative centred in Geneva in coping with this problem.

6. You might like to discuss this with the Minister if there should be a convenient opportunity and let us know his views. This problem had been on our minds from the beginning — we do remember that the Minister did not wish us to become the principal channel for informing the Asians of what took place at Geneva. Matters were facilitated until now at the Ottawa end by the fact that Baig was lecturing in the West and Saksena was at ECOSOC in New York. Both are back in Ottawa now, however, and may soon drop in. Hence our request for a line on the line to follow.

Yours sincerely,

J.A. CHAPDELAINE

P.S. I enclose a copy in case you wish to send it to the Minister.

La conférence de Genève sur l'Indochine, coprésidée par le Royaume-Uni et l'Union soviétique, et qui réunit notamment la France, les États-Unis, la Répub-lique populaire de Chine, les États associés d'Indochine et la République démocratique du Vietnam, s'ouvre le 7 mai 1954. Elle se termine le 21 juillet 1954 lorsque les accords de cessez-le-feu (ACF) sont signés par le Vietnam, le Laos et le Cambodge.¹⁸ Le Vietnam est divisé temporairement jusqu'en 1956 lorsque des élections doivent se tenir dans tout le pays. L'accord prévoit le retrait des troupes françaises et vietnamiennes du nord du 17^e parallèle et le retrait des troupes du Vietminh du sud du pays. Les accords du Laos et du Cambodge prévoient le retrait des forces du Vietminh de ces deux pays et leur neutralisation subséquente. Les trois accords comportent également des dispositions visant à faciliter la libre circulation des réfugiés et garantit aux différents gouvernements d'Indochine le droit de maintenir des forces armées, d'importer des armes et de garder des conseillers militaires étrangers. La conformité aux accords sera assurée par la Commission internationale de surveillance. Les États-Unis refusent de signer les ACS mais publient un communiqué le 21 juin 1954, dans lequel il promettent de «respecter» les conditions de l'armistice.¹⁹ Le Canada ne participe de près à la Conférence de Genève sur l'Indochine qu'à la toute fin, juste avant la conclusion des ACF, lorsqu'il est question de la composition de la Commission.

The Geneva Conference on Indochina, which was jointly chaired by the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union, and included France, the United States, the People's Republic of China, the Associated States of Indochina and the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, opened on May 7, 1954. It closed on July 21, 1954 when Cease-Fire Agreements (CFAs) were signed for Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia.¹⁸ Vietnam was partitioned temporarily until 1956 when elections were to be held throughout the country. The agreement provided for the removal of French and Vietnamese troops from north of the 17th parallel and the withdrawal of Vietminh troops from the southern parts of the country. The agreements for Laos and Cambodia provided for the withdrawal of Vietminh forces from those two countries and their subsequent neutralization. The three agreements also included provisions to facilitate the free movement of refugees and guaranteed the various Indochinese governments the right to maintain advisors. Compliance with the agreements was to be monitored by an international supervisory commission. The United States refused to sign the CFAs but issued a statement on July 21, 1954 promising to "respect" the terms of the armistice.¹⁹ Canada was not closely associated with the Geneva Conference on Indochina until just prior to the conclusion of the CFAs when the question of the composition of the supervisory commission was discussed.

INDO-CHINA

Following for MacKay from Allard, Begins: Impossible for me tonight to reply to the three points raised during our conversation because of continuous meetings going on and difficulty of speaking with anyone of United Kingdom, United States or French delegations.

2. Tahourdin with whom I discussed the matter by telephone saw me for a few minutes before an evening meeting and was somewhat upset at the thought that some Canadian newspapers may have information about Canada having been mentioned as possible member of the Supervisory Commission. There was no, repeat no, reference to this proposal either in local Swiss papers or London papers available here today.

3. The suggestion made by the Chinese delegate at yesterday's meeting that members of the Commission should be India, Canada and Poland came as complete surprise. This proposal is being discussed between friendly delegations but no, repeat no, decision has yet been arrived at concerning this Chinese proposal mainly because of possible repercussions of leaving out other Colombo Plan countries. When our side has decided whether or not, repeat not, they can accept the Chinese proposal it will come before full session of nine delegations and details, such as terms of reference etc, will then be decided and a formal invitation will be made to each of the countries concerned.

4. Unfortunately more details can only be expected tomorrow morning from United Kingdom sources and calls are also to be made on United States and French delegations early Friday morning.

5. Meanwhile, Tahourdin who spoke to Eden, said they were both very anxious to keep this matter very confidential until our side has decided as to whether or not, repeat not, they can accept the Chinese proposal. Will report soonest. Ends.

INTERNATIONAL SUPERVISORY COMMISSION — INDO-CHINA

Terms of reference are not yet agreed but it has been common ground that Commission would supervise whatever general settlement was reached, see that cease-fire was observed and watch over the carrying out of undertakings in respect of regrouping of forces. The time that this last process may take has been variously estimated at from 2 to 6 months. It is not known in London whether Supervisory Commission will be asked to assume any responsibility for holding of elections but it is thought that in any case it will have to remain in being and in position until after elections have been held.

2. As of today east and west were still in disagreement (a) as to whether Supervisory Commission should take decisions by majority vote or by unanimity. The Foreign Office are still hopeful that decisions can be taken by majority vote. (b) As to whether decisions of Commission should be mandatory and final or should be susceptible of reference back to the powers constituting the Geneva Conference on Indo-China.

3. In view of probable terms of reference I think members of Supervisory Commission are likely to be senior soldiers with staff, administrative or diplomatic experience. No one at this stage can make a useful guess as to numbers of personnel required though Secretariat experience in Kashmir and Palestine should be relevant. If Commission is set up and if India accepts membership on if I should think it reasonable for her as nearest country to provide a large proportion of clerical and security personnel needed. In principle each country would have to provide its own staff and make its own administrative arrangements. I should think a knowledge of French would be useful for anyone assigned to this errand.

4. The Commission should be set up as quickly as possible after a cease-fire has been arranged. Perhaps agreement could be reached on India as nearest country and with recent Korean experience supplying interim representation on the spot pending arrival of representatives of other participating countries.

5. Assumption in London is that Commission's terms of reference would cover the three Associated States in each of which each of the participating countries would wish to have its own observers.

6. Canadian membership would certainly imply "neutrality" in respect of supervising the carrying out of an agreed international understanding.

7. Foregoing answers are based on information available in London at this time of night and subject to correction. However, your questions are being repeated immediately to United Kingdom delegation in Geneva and if they reply tonight their answer will be relayed to you at once through Earsncliffe.

8. It is believed here that prospect of acceptance of invitation by India will be greatly influenced by character of Canadian reply. Task suggested is certainly ungrateful but I do not see how we can do other than accept it.

TELEGRAM WA-1278

Washington, July 20, 1954

SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

INDO-CHINA — INTERNATIONAL CONTROL COMMISSION

This message contains answers to the questions raised in EX-1237,† so far as we have been able to obtain them from the State Department. The department point out that their information is neither full nor precise, having been taken from French and Soviet papers which have been used during the Geneva negotiations. They say that at the present time Geneva would be the only place to obtain complete and up-to-date information about the commission.

Terms of Reference

2. The International Control Commission would be charged with supervising the implementation by both sides of the provisions of the cease-fire agreement. For this purpose it would carry out a mission of control, observation, inspection and investigation related to the application of the provisions of the agreement. The Commission would create both fixed and mobile inspection teams and would have the right of free movement. The Commission would:

(a) Control the movement of the armed forces of the two sides to see that it was carried out within the framework of the regrouping plan;

(b) Watch over the demarkation lines between the regrouping zones as well as the demilitarized zones;

(c) Control the operation involved in the freeing of prisoners-of-war and civilian internees;

(d) In the ports and airports as well as on all the frontiers of Viet-Nam watch over the application of the clauses of the agreement on the cessation of hostilities having to do with the introduction into the country of armed forces, of military personnel and of all types of armament, munitions and war material.

3. Recommendations and arbitral decisions of the Commission would be by majority vote. Important questions, however, such as those relating to violations of the armistice which could result in resumption of hostilities, would have to be settled by unanimous vote.

4. The Commission would be empowered to formulate recommendations regarding amendments and conditions which it might be desirable to make to the provisions of the agreement on the cessation of hostilities, in order to ensure a more efficacious application of the agreement. These recommendations would have to be by unanimous vote.

5. As an operative instrument a joint commission of representatives of the commanders of both sides would be set up with three principal functions: (I) To ensure that the cease-fire order is carried out; (II) To set in motion regrouping of regular forces and disarmament of irregulars; (III) To ensure that regrouping is carried out correctly. The joint commission of the commanders would report to the International Control Commission, which would arbitrate disputes in the joint commission of commanders.

Likely Composition

6. Details are not known here. It would presumably be military in character, since there has been no mention of civilian personnel. Officials here believe that it is not now planned that the International Control Commission would take out its own troops.

When Would Commission Begin to Function

7. As soon as possible. Working documents at Geneva call for the commission to be on the spot at the moment of cessation of hostilities. This will not be possible if, as seems likely, the cease-fire is set for two days after the signature of the agreement at Geneva. We made the observation to the State Department officials, although the United States is not primarily concerned, that Governments which were invited to serve on the control commission would need some time before replying to go through required constitutional processes, apart from other considerations.

Laos and Cambodia

8. Apparently separate and similar commissions are envisaged for Viet-Nam, Laos and Cambodia, with some sort of international co-ordinating committee. It is not clear here exactly how this scheme would work. State Department officials seemed to think it likely that the three commissions would have the same national membership, since otherwise great confusion would probably be caused.

Canadian Role

9. It was agreed in my telephone conversation on July 19 with MacKay that we would not put to the State Department No. 5 of the questions set out in EX-1237.† We were reluctant to put these questions because it might, we thought, elicit from them and put on record an assumption that Canada should play a role that we might wish to assume. We suppose that by the terms of reference a “judicial” impartiality will be expected of the commission although the implications of the obvious balance in the proposed membership is clear enough. We were afraid that these questions might give a somewhat misleading impression that Canada's behaviour as a member of the commission might be affected by consultation with others.

10. These and similar delicate questions emphasize what a difficult and important matter the appointment of a Canadian representative would be. I know you agree that it would be necessary to find a man of intelligence, courage and patience and experience. Physical fitness would also have to be considered, as the probabilities are that arduous work will have to be done under taxing circumstances.

TELEGRAM 852

Following for the Minister from Robertson, Begins: I have informed the United Kingdom Government of the content of our conversation, and they are advising Eden at once, making it plain that until Canada has received a formal invitation and has been officially advised of the terms of reference and the responsibilities of the International Advisory Commission, it would not be possible for the government to give a definite answer. At the same time I said that in the circumstances there was every prospect that the answer would be favourable. While I was at the CRO, I learned that they had just received a message from Nehru, very similar to the one you had given me, that India could not give a definite answer until it had received an official invitation, had an opportunity of studying the terms of reference of the Supervisory Commission, and was able to form an opinion of the general character of the settlements which had been reached at Geneva. The "warning" message to Nehru did not get off until some hours after the message to Ottawa, and Nehru's message to London was in fact based on the Geneva press report which reached him before the United Kingdom message. He did, however, say that if the Geneva powers were agreed in asking India to serve on the Supervisory Commission, and if Canada was prepared to accept the invitation, then it would be extremely difficult for India to refuse.

2. As you will appreciate, all tentative agreements reached in Geneva during the last 48 hours are contingent one on the other. There is as yet no finality about anything. No one is yet in a position to give an official invitation to the countries which the powers meeting in Geneva have agreed among themselves would be acceptable as members of an International Supervisory Commission. Similarly there are as yet no agreed terms of reference for the Commission. This absence of finality is due partly to unresolved differences as to powers and procedures of the Supervisory Commission, and partly to the fact that any agreement which may be reached about the organization of the Commission itself is contingent on agreements also being reached on the lines of demarcation, election dates, etc.

3. Some of the press reports that Canada, India and Poland had been invited to constitute an International Supervisory Commission went on to say that India would be the Chairman. The United Kingdom have no information to support this and are asking their delegation in Geneva if they can clarify the position. Ends.

INDOCHINA SUPERVISORY COMMISSIONS

Following from Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: Before taking a decision on membership in the Supervisory Commissions it is most important for us to understand the relation of the powers which participated in the Geneva Conference to the Commissions. The source of the Commissions' authority is uncertain and it is therefore difficult to know to whom the Commissions are ultimately responsible. In the draft French Working Paper on the Commissions,²⁰ which is as yet all we have to go on, it is indicated that the Commissions might refer disputes back to the "guarantor powers". This provision seems to have been covered in the last clause of the "final declaration" of the Geneva Conference as reported in the press: "The members of the Conference agree to consult one another on a question which may be referred to them by the International Supervisory Commissions in order to study such measures as may prove necessary to ensure that the agreements on the cessation of hostilities in Cambodia, Lao and Vietnam are respected."

2. In view of the fact however that the United States appears not to have joined in this final declaration and to have issued a unilateral statement, it is by no means certain whether we could consider the United States as one of the so-called "guarantor powers". The position of the United States as of July 20, according to a report from the United Kingdom Delegation, was explained by Bedell Smith to Mendes-France when he said that "if the United States could respect such a settlement they could not repeat not sign any agreed declaration, nor could they even take note of (let alone agree) a clause which might provide for consultation between members of the Conference in the event of their being some disagreement later over the execution of the terms of any eventual agreement".

3. We fully understand that the United States position has been of necessity equivocal. Nevertheless, we are preparing to take an extremely serious decision which may involve us in no end of trouble and embarrassment for a few years at least. Before taking such a decision we must be assured of the attitude which the strongest democratic power will adopt towards our activities. Even if they must make ambiguous public statements, we think that they should be prepared to offer some private explanation of the attitude which they will adopt towards the activity of the Commissions and of our position on them. The consequences for us of being involved in a difficult and politically dangerous enterprise such as this without even moral support from the United States would be serious indeed.

4. I discussed this matter with the Minister last night after our conversation with you on the telephone and explained to him your view that it would be difficult for you to secure at this point any satisfactory statement from the Secretary of State. He feels nevertheless that this is a matter of very great importance to us and one which will concern Cabinet in making its final decision and thinks therefore that you should explain fully our preoccupations to the State Department and endeavour to elucidate insofar as possible the American attitude.²¹ Ends.

mission and the place of the first meeting for general organizational discussions. Menon flying to Delhi on Sunday.

2. Without wanting to give the impression that it came from him, Menon thought Canada might feel New Delhi suitable as the first meeting place for the International Supervisory Commission as the capital of the country of the chairmen and also on the way to the field of operations. You may already have received a feeler from New Delhi. Indians after discussing with Chou En-Lai feel that the main Commission which would deal with Vietnam, should have delegations of five officials from each participating country headed by military officers of rank of General. Officers of lower rank could take charge of delegations — three officers from each participating country — in both Laos and Cambodia in order to prevent what they describe as a possible clash between Generals. Officers of lesser rank, one from each participating country, would be assigned to various inspection teams to be stationed at fixed points provided in agreements which number fourteen for Vietnam, eight for Laos, and five for Cambodia, plus an unknown number of officials from each of the participating countries for mobile teams.

3. This would therefore require as a minimum, 156 Canadian officials plus logistical support. Chou En-Lai's first reaction concerning number was that they would, all told, come to approximately one thousand, but Menon said he tried to bring him down to earth.

4. Indians had not, repeat not, so far secured the three texts but said they were getting them today locally through British sources.

5. As for budgets question they had no, repeat no, information and thought each delegation should be prepared to start operating at its own expense. They are wondering in fact, who will pay the representatives in spite of the provisions contained in each agreement that expenses should be borne equally by each one of the countries concerned.

6. Paris and London will presumably be in a better position from now on to inform you of details than we will be here. Offroy with whom I discussed yesterday, will be going to Paris Sunday and can be reached through the Quai d'Orsay.

INDO-CHINA SUPERVISORY COMMISSION

Following are some of the points which have been raised in my discussions with the Foreign Secretary and the Defence Secretary who were both consulted by the Prime Minister yesterday:

(i) Though Eden-Molotov message refers to each country having "representatives" on each Commission, India's view is that each country can have only one representative on each Commission, though the representative would have alternates.

(ii) Prime Minister's tentative decision is that the three Indian representatives would be civilians who will be given Ambassadorial rank and they would have military and civilian advisers.

(iii) Some machinery will be required for coordination and liaison between the three Commissions.

(iv) Military observers. Is each of the three countries to provide military observers? If so would they have to operate in three-man teams?

(v) Armed forces. Presumably security guards will be required for the Commission and their agencies similar to the United Nations guards in Palestine. Will armed forces be required to patrol the neutral zone? Should the security guards and armed forces be contributed by each of the three countries or solely by India? My impression is that if the numbers required are only a few hundreds, India would be prepared to furnish them all. I am not, repeat not, however, clear about the extent of the responsibilities of the Commissions for maintaining law and order without which they cannot discharge their functions.

(vi) Secretariat. Secretariats will be required for each Commission. A mixed secretariat is, in Indian view, impossible. Their tentative suggestion, therefore, is that India would provide the secretariats.

(vii) Headquarters. The Foreign Secretary appeared to assume that the headquarters of the Commission for Vietnam would be in the neutral zone though other commissions could be located in the capitals of Laos and Cambodia.

(viii) Logistical support will be required for Commissions' guards and troops and for the Commissions and their employees.

(ix) Who is to refund the three countries for their expenses — presumably the members Geneva Conference on Indo-China.

(x) How do the Commissions take up problems with the members of this Conference? Would it not, repeat not, be wise for the Geneva Conference to establish some secretariat?

(xi) What is the status of the United States in relation to the Commissions since it did not associate itself with the crisis?

2. To permit India to provide armed forces and secretariats might give them opportunities to exert undue influences. This has to be weighed against the disadvantages of Polish participation. Much depends on whether India's chief representatives are susceptible to pro-Chinese influences.

3. Before India accepted the responsibility of Korea it sent an advance team to Korea under the Foreign Secretary. He is contemplating suggesting that an advance team be sent to Indo-China but he has not, repeat not, yet worked out the relationship between this suggestion and the suggestion for a preliminary meeting of the principal representatives in New Delhi.

4. Foreign Secretary would welcome your preliminary comments on the matters raised in this and previous telegrams.

INDOCHINA — SUPERVISORY COMMISSIONS

We are grateful for your reports and comments on Indian thinking. In this message we shall deal only with organizational arrangements which are the most urgent problems.

2. We are prepared to agree to the Indian suggestion, if the Canadian Government accepts membership, and would send representatives to New Delhi for preliminary organizational discussions who would not be the eventual Canadian representatives on the Commissions. The Minister had thought of asking Cabinet for a final decision on July 28 but Indian and Polish acceptances may require earlier action. We would try to meet the date of August 1 for the first meeting if it proved generally acceptable.

3. Our thought is that a small military and civilian team should go to New Delhi and thereafter proceed to Saigon to establish a Canadian headquarters, as this city would appear to be the most convenient centre of internal and external communications in Indochina. We would expect this team, in addition to military people concerned with administration and communications, to include a senior officer from this Department, who would return to Ottawa, and at least a junior officer and a clerk who might remain in Saigon as the nucleus of an office that would serve as an administrative centre for Canadians in Indochina and maintain such political liaison as may be required. Because of shortness of notice it is unlikely that we can send other departmental personnel at once.

4. There is one point which we should like you to discuss with the Indians. We wonder if there is not merit in having a single individual named as Chief Representative to each of the three Commissions, who would have three deputies. It seems to us that this might make for better coordination of Canadian (Indian, Polish) action. The Commissioner could attend meetings of whichever of the three commissions seemed most important at the moment and would be represented at the other two by deputies. Transportation difficulties might of course make this impractical. Ends.

SUPERVISORY COMMISSION, INDO-CHINA

1. Although the Foreign Office have tried to be helpful, it is evident that little if any thought was given at Geneva to the practical questions involved in bringing the Commission into operation, or to the exact nature of its composition. It was only at a late stage for example, that owing to the refusal of the Cambodians to accept any co-ordinating body, the formula was adopted whereby the heads of the respective secretariats were to be charged with this function. So far as we know, the secretariats had not been mentioned before, and no provision is made for their composition, though presumably the positions of Secretary-General would be distributed between the three participants.

2. It looks therefore as though we are pretty much on our own now in working out the ways and means of setting up the Commissions, with primary responsibility resting on the Indians, as chairmen. They too are seeking guidance, and R.K. Nehru has asked what the implication is of the words "in consultation with the governments of Canada and Poland" in paragraph 2 of the invitation, and in particular whether level of representation was expected to be a matter for consultation or whether this simply meant that practical arrangements for a secretariat, etc, were to be agreed in consultation between the three governments. C.R.O. have had no more success than we in finding answers to such questions, and I think we must assume that everything is subject to consultation between the three member governments that is not specifically provided for in the Agreements.

3. This brings us up against the problem of the Poles and I can see no other course (assuming they accept) than for the Indians to invite them and ourselves to settle the preliminary details. Looking at it from here, I should be inclined to favour New Delhi as the meeting place since India, as Chairman, could logically convene an organization meeting there, and I should think it advisable to have the Poles brought in as early as possible.

INDO-CHINA SUPERVISORY COMMISSIONS

The Acting Under-Secretary's telegram under reference was received after my telephone conversation with you of the afternoon of July 22. This conversation elaborated and to some extent modified the sense of EX-1263. As agreed, I arranged to see the Deputy Under-Secretary which I did yesterday afternoon July 23. I immediately afterward reported over the telephone to MacKay.

2. Paul Sturm, former United States Consul in Hanoi and on temporary duty in the Department for Indo-Chinese Affairs, was with Murphy; McCardle accompanied me. The conversation was friendly and informal, but I asked Murphy to communicate its substance to the Secretary of State. I said that, when the Canadian Government had made their decision, I would want to call on Mr. Dulles himself. I would also wish to see the Under-Secretary sometime next week. He had returned from Europe that morning.

3. My object in waiting upon the Deputy Under-Secretary, I said, was to inform the United States Government that the Canadian Government were considering the serious problems posed by the invitation from the Geneva Conference to join with India and Poland in constituting Supervisory Commissions for the execution of the Geneva Agreement. As yet, much of the information necessary to a decision had not been received in Ottawa. We had not been consulted in advance and we certainly had not sought all the pain and grief which we realized would inevitably be involved in undertaking this task. If we decided to do so (and I indicated that the government were so disposed) we would do it as a matter of stern international duty. We had no illusions as to the extent and complexity of the political difficulties which would be encountered, to say nothing of the administrative problems of all kinds which we would have to face in an area of the world where we had neither experience nor any framework of representation.

4. If the government decided to accept membership on the Commissions, I went on, we would wish to keep the United States Government informed privately of the course of events. This we felt we could do quite properly without impinging upon our international responsibilities as members of the Commissions. For reasons we understood the [U.S.] government had felt compelled to dissociate themselves from the Geneva settlement; nevertheless, we knew that their interest and concern in what took place in South East Asia would continue to be very close.

5. Then I went on to put three questions, to the first two of which I said that I did not expect answers off the bat. In the first place, we were not at all sure how the United States Government regarded their own relationship to the Geneva settlement in view of the formal dissociation with it which had been made by Bedell Smith (and subsequently, of course, by the President). Did they, for example, consider themselves as part of the Geneva Conference to which the International Commissions were under certain circumstances required to report? Second, did they have any views concerning the way the Commissions should operate? We were not asking for their advice, but if they had any observations to offer we would be glad to take them into account. Third, the State Department must have a good deal of practical local knowledge concerning conditions in the Associated States. Would they be willing to let us have such information as would be helpful for us in establishing our representation out there? Post reports, for instance, would be very useful since we had, I thought, almost nothing of the kind in Ottawa.

6. It was clear, I think, that Murphy welcomed my call and the information which I conveyed to him concerning the Canadian Government's position as outlined above. He was very much surprised that we had not been consulted in advance concerning membership and had obviously assumed that we must have been. He expressed himself as appreciating completely the need for the government to have time and more information before making their decision. He was clearly grateful for the suggestion that we should keep them informed of how things went. He said that the State Department would be very happy to provide us with whatever local information we thought would be useful.

7. Murphy's response to my question (somewhat slantingly posed, I admit, because I did not think we should appear to be seeking United States advice on this) whether we had any real option other than to accept the invitation from the Conference was pretty reserved even for him. But he did say that the United States would be a good deal happier to have us on the Commissions rather than others and that it would certainly be a grave responsibility for us to refuse to serve. And there was not the slightest suggestion at any point in our conversation that our acceptance would be in any way resented by the United States Government. As I said to Murphy, we realized that, if we took the job on and discharged it conscientiously as we would do, we would be subject to criticism from our friends as well as others. On this score we had no illusions.

8. McCardle will be getting from Sturm a good deal of the information which the United States authorities have about the Commissions' set-up, and we will be sending you in an early teletype such items as we think may be helpful in helping you reach decisions about how to proceed in setting up our teams. We shall also hope to send on next week by bag whatever we get from the State Department about local conditions in Indo-China. Meantime, I would be grateful if you would let me know whether you agree that, once the government's decision is taken, I should see the Secretary of State himself; if so, I would be grateful for such additional guidance as you can give me concerning what I should put to him.

INDO-CHINA SUPERVISORY COMMISSIONS

The Foreign Secretary's personal reaction to your suggestion in paragraph 4 is that this is a sound proposal. His only hesitation is that this might offend the susceptibilities of Laos and Cambodia who would realize that the Commissioner would be spending most of his time in Viet Nam. You may, therefore, wish to sound out the French Prime Minister on this.

2. Because of the susceptibilities of Laos and Cambodia, he doubts there can be any single headquarters for the three Commissions. So far as the Commission for Viet Nam is concerned, he thinks the Viet Minh would not, repeat not, agree to Saigon and that Hue might be more suitable because it is more central, is close to the demarkation line and could perhaps be neutralized.

3. Foreign Secretary questions, as I do, date set forth by Krishna Menon as reported in the last sentence of my telegram No. 246 of July 24th.† It seems to us that the Commissions and their agencies must be installed sooner than twenty-two days to thirty-seven days after the cease-fire.

4. The task of top priority is obviously the setting up of the military inspection teams, since all investigations have to be made by these teams. Foreign Secretary estimates that about 35 officers of about the rank of Major will be required by India for the 25 fixed teams and an unknown number for the mobile teams.

5. On the Repatriation Commission in Korea, India maintained that the Indian Government was Chairman of the Commission, not Thimayya. The Swedes maintained that the Swedish representative was serving in his individual capacity. Foreign Secretary suggests New Delhi meeting might decide this point in respect of the Indo-China Commissions.

6. Recommend our representatives to the meeting in New Delhi bring with them the French text of the Agreement as well as the English text since the French text may clarify some obscurity in the English text.

COMMISSION FOR INDO-CHINA

Following for the Minister from Léger, Begins: I had a conversation with Grafstrom, Swedish Minister here, who wished me to let you know in the light of his own experience on official Commissions he believed Canada would be placed in impossible position were it to agree to serve with India and Poland on the Commission for Indo-China. His view is that position of Canada would even be more difficult than that of Sweden or Switzerland since they, at least, were two to face the intransigency of the Communists and the ambiguity of India. He foresees a serious danger that on many vital issues Canada will be left alone to oppose the two other members of the Commission. Ends.

INTERNATIONAL SUPERVISORY COMMISSIONS

In the expectation that Cabinet will agree tomorrow to Canadian participation, plans have been made for R.M. Macdonnell to proceed to Delhi arriving probably July 31. He will be accompanied by Air Commodore Rutledge, Coordinator of the Joint Staff. Ballachey and Finnie of this Department will follow and proceed later to Indochina to form part of the permanent establishment. Macdonnell will assist you in the Delhi meetings and then proceed to Indochina to make necessary arrangements there before returning to Ottawa. Neither he nor Rutledge will be part of the permanent establishment. We fully recognize the desirability of sending to the preliminary negotiations those who will be working with the Commissions, but it has not been possible to make any firm appointments yet especially as we are still in considerable doubt as to the kind and status of people who will be required. The problem of inoculations would also delay the despatch of personnel from Ottawa but General Foulkes hopes to send as many people as possible from Korea for the early stages at least.

2. Brigadier R.E.A. Morton, Military Attaché in Tokyo, has been instructed to proceed immediately to Delhi to assist in the discussions there and act temporarily in Indochina as representative of the Chiefs of Staff pending a more permanent establishment.

3. National Defence representatives will bring with them cypher equipment and staff.

4. You will be notified of travel arrangements when they are firm.

LETTER OF INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVES TO THE NEW DELHI MEETINGS ON INDOCHINA

Dear Mr. Macdonnell:

I would be grateful if you would take with you to New Delhi this letter of instructions for the guidance of Mr. Reid and yourself in the discussions with representatives of the Indian and Polish Governments on the setting up of the International Supervisory Commissions for Indochina.

2. As you know, you will be accompanied by Air Commodore Rutledge, Coordinator of the Joint Staff, and Brigadier Morton, Canadian Military Attaché in Tokyo, will be proceeding directly to New Delhi to take part in the discussions. Air Commodore Rutledge will no doubt be taking with him his own instructions relating to the military aspects of the problems to be discussed in New Delhi. You should, therefore, discuss with him and Brigadier Morton those parts of these instructions which relate to service matters, particularly as there has not been time for detailed discussions on these matters with National Defence in Ottawa.

(1) Judicial Impartiality

3. While it will no doubt be assumed — and correctly — that Canada's representatives on the three Commissions will reflect a Western outlook in their approach to the problems which the Commissions will have to solve, it is important that they should at all times do their utmost to maintain an attitude of judicial impartiality in the performance of their duties. In particular, it would seem to be imperative that we should impress upon the Indians our attitude of objectivity and fairness so that, when the Commissions have important decisions to take, we could hope that they would give our views serious and favourable consideration, particularly when majority reports will have to be submitted to the Geneva powers.

4. While we do expect to keep our friends and allies, when appropriate, informed of the work of the Commissions, we do not intend thereby to let them direct our decisions. Moreover, in accepting to participate, we have not taken it upon ourselves to favour any cause or interest, other than seeing to it that the Geneva Agreements are properly executed. In the circumstances, every reasonable effort should be made to avoid giving the impression of partiality in the performance of your duties.

(2) Practical Limitations on Canadian Participation

5. There is a limit to what a country of Canada's resources and population can do in Southeast Asia. Our commitments are already heavy and existing undertakings, such as those at NATO or in Korea, are such as to circumscribe Canadian participation in some phases of the Commissions' operations, e.g., personnel, logistical support, communications equipment.

(a) Composition of the Commissions

6. We should hope, as much for reasons of flexibility and efficiency within the Commissions themselves as for our already heavy personnel commitments elsewhere, that it would be possible to restrict the number of personnel on each Commission and on the inspection teams to the basic minimum consistent with the proper discharge of their functions. It would, for instance, be extremely difficult for the Department of National Defence to have to provide several hundred officers and men for this task over and above existing commitments. For our part, moreover, the personnel problems of this Department are now such as to preclude the possibility of providing large numbers of Foreign Service Officers as political advisers for our Commissioners, to say nothing of stenographic and clerical staff.

(b) Logistical Support

7. For much the same reasons, we would not wish to find ourselves in the position of being asked to provide the major part of the Commissions' logistical support and communications equipment. We are of course willing to do our share and indeed the Department of National Defence is giving this aspect of the matter its urgent attention. However, it would seem to us that the basic part of such equipment as may not be readily available on the ground in Indochina for these purposes might more expeditiously be supplied by India, as the geographically closest participant, since the Commissions are expected to be operational at an early date.

8. In the preliminary discussions which are about to get under way in New Delhi concerning organizational and operational arrangements, such as those carried in the remainder of this letter, I should be grateful if you would bear these general thoughts in mind.

9. Listed below are a number of topics which will presumably be discussed in New Delhi, together with brief comments suggesting our preliminary views in each case. This commentary is not exhaustive, and there will no doubt be a number of subjects which will come up in New Delhi which have not been touched upon here. In dealing with matters of this kind it will be necessary for you to use your own discretion in expressing the Canadian point of view. Where possible you should, of course, seek instructions from Ottawa before taking a definite stand on controversial points.

10. Commissioners. The principal problem here seems to be whether the commissioners should be military or civilian. The Poles have already nominated three civilians to fill their commissionerships; the Indians now seem to incline to the view that the commissioners should be military. We are inclined to this view ourselves, though the best solution may be to leave the matter optional to the appointing governments. We have no strong views, however, and will be glad to consider reasonable proposals. We would like to have the earliest possible advice as to when each of the three commissioners we will be supplying will be required for duty, as well as any assistants they will need.

11. Status of Representatives. The cease fire agreements say that the International Commissions shall be composed of representatives of Canada, India, and Poland. The states concerned are not members of the Commissions, nor are the individual representatives merely nominated by the states concerned to act in their personal capacities. Circumstances will require that the Commissioners deal with situations expeditiously on their own initiative, but we assume that each will be acting on general instructions from his government and advice provided from time to time. The Commissioners will in fact be delegates with full powers, and at no time should it be necessary for the work of any Commission to be held up until instructions can be obtained from the governments concerned. Nevertheless we consider that it will be essential for each Commissioner to have secure means of communication with his own government. We trust that the arrangements that will be made to provide for this will enable our Commissioners to pass confidential communications to each other without delay.

12. Liaison between the Commissions and the Geneva Conference Powers. This is a matter of procedure which should normally present no serious problems. Since the invitations to India, Poland and Canada were issued by Messrs. Eden and Molotov, and since the two co-chairmen of the Geneva Conference on Indochina have undertaken to inform the other Geneva Conference powers of the replies to the invitations, they may be prepared to continue to act in a liaison capacity between the Commission powers or the Commissions themselves and the Geneva Conference powers. If so, the Commissions, when desiring to report to the Geneva Conference powers, could simply address identical communications to Messrs. Eden and Molotov, with the request that they be transmitted to the other Geneva Conference powers. This would get around for the moment the difficulties posed by the equivocal position of the United States. This liaison procedure would presumably have to be confirmed by the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union, which India, as the chairman country for the commissions, could appropriately arrange. It would be for the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union to determine whether any continuing secretariat for the Geneva Conference would be necessary.

13. Liaison between Commissions. This should present no special problems, and we see no reason why any elaborate liaison organization or joint secretariat need be set up. The Commissions should be able to communicate directly one with another by telegram. In addition, a courier service will probably be required by each Commission, and some arrangements may have to be made with the governments and commands concerned to ensure that the couriers can carry Commission documents from one headquarters to another without delay or interference. These arrangements might be worked out with Cambodian, Laotian, Vietnam and Vietminh representatives in New Delhi. If a joint secretariat or liaison organization is considered necessary, the question of its location will arise. Saigon may be considered a desirable location because of its communications facilities, but we believe that no decision on this should be taken before careful consideration is given to the possible consequence of agreeing to an arrangement which would enable large groups of Poles to establish themselves in Saigon.

14. Secretariat. We believe that since India is to be the chairman country, and in view of India's relative closeness geographically, the Indians should supply virtually the entire secretariats of the three Commissions. We are inclined to think that for purposes of coordination between the three Commissions, it would be desirable for the titular Secretary-General in each case to be an Indian. This would avoid the question of appointing a Pole to one of these positions. We would like to be in a position to nominate Canadians to occupy positions in the three Secretariats where they could observe operations and ensure that the Canadian view is adequately presented. It may be that Canadians would be helpful in dealing with French language matters, but we would not be satisfied with just being assigned interpreter-ships. We have no strong views on the number of deputy Secretaries-General in each Commission or their distribution. The discussions may indicate whether the position of deputy Secretary General will be an appropriate one for a Canadian nominee to hold in order to ensure that Canadian views are properly taken into account.

15. Liaison with Commands. Some special communications arrangements may be necessary to enable the Commissions to keep in touch with the various commands. We would hope that this will form part of the work of the secretariat, and that any special communications units which may be required will be provided by the Indians.

16. Inspection Teams. This will be a matter of primary concern to the Defence authorities, since the personnel of the teams is likely to be almost exclusively military. We believe that there should be a full discussion of the functions of each of the fixed teams for the points listed in the cease fire agreements. Representatives of France, Laos, Cambodia, Vietnam and Vietminh should be able to provide detailed information concerning the military situation in the vicinity of each point, logistical problems, etc. Out of this discussion some reasonably firm ideas as to the numbers of officers required, their ranks, specialist qualifications, etc. and whether air force and naval components may be required for air and sea ports, should emerge. It should also be possible to determine to some extent the likelihood of increases or decreases in the work of the fixed teams as the terms of the agreements are progressively carried out. This discussion could be followed by a discussion of the requirements for mobile teams, and the extent to which mobile teams can be drawn from reserve personnel on the fixed teams. In all these discussions you will bear in mind our desire to minimize our personnel commitments as far as possible.

17. Security Guards. We are of the view that all headquarters sentries as well as mobile guards for inspection teams should be provided by India. You will bear in mind that we will wish to have some satisfactory security arrangements for Canadian classified documents at the three Headquarters and at our own liaison office in Saigon.

18. Language. There will presumably be some discussion of working and official languages for the Commissions. In practice it would seem likely that communications from the commands will probably be in French, and for the efficient despatch of business it will clearly be desirable that all communications from the Commissions to the commands be in the same language. Each Commission will presumably wish to determine its own working language or languages. If a Polish Commissioner is unable to work in either English or French, we would assume he would provide his own translators or interpreters. We would not wish to see Polish recognized as an official language. It seems likely that there will be a need for French-English interpreters and translators, both in the Commissions and with the field teams. It is quite possible that the Indians and Poles may urge that Canada produce such personnel, in which case it will be necessary to bear in mind how difficult it will be to obtain satisfactory people on short notice for work of this kind in Indochina. We certainly could not make a broad commitment to find translators and interpreters without very careful investigations first.

19. Finance. As we want our own representatives in Indochina to do a fair amount of reporting in our own interest, it is desirable that the cost of salaries and travel of our own personnel and communications between our personnel and Ottawa be borne by the Canadian Government. We hope that the parties directly concerned will be providing board and lodging and transport facilities for Commission and inspection team personnel. The costs of the secretariat, security guards and supplementary communications might be covered in part at least by the United Kingdom-France-China-USSR fund which has been agreed upon in principle.

20. Reporting. In sending reports on the New Delhi meetings, and subsequently from Saigon, you should bear in mind our obligation and desire to keep the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, the United States and France informed. To simplify our task in this regard, it might be helpful if you were to send reports in a form which could be shown to these Governments. Please inform us what information has been given to the local representatives of these Governments. Any further comment which you might wish to add of a more restricted nature might be sent in a supplementary telegram marked "for Canadian eyes only". We are studying the possibility of setting up a separate series of communications along the lines of CRO Circular telegrams which would facilitate the transmission of information on the Indochina operation to our friends, and will notify you of any procedural changes in communications which might be required in this connection.

21. Interpretation of Agreements. We have not had sufficient time to study the texts of the agreements to offer you any helpful commentary on their interpretation. Any views which we believe can be helpful to you on this subject will be passed to you subsequently.

22. Office in Saigon. In any mention you make to the Indians and Poles of the office we plan to open in Saigon, you should refer to it as a liaison office for administrative purposes. No reference should be made to its quasi-diplomatic functions, and neither the Vietnam nor French representatives should be given the impression that we are planning to open a diplomatic mission in Saigon.²²

23. You will be proceeding to Saigon after the conclusion of the New Delhi talks. It would be appreciated if you would send us as much advance notice as possible as to the personnel and other requirements for opening the office there, and any other information which will be of assistance to us in making arrangements for the despatch of our Commissioners and their staffs.

My best wishes to you and Mr. Reid for the success of your mission.

Yours sincerely,

R.A. MACKAY

INDO-CHINA; MEMBERSHIP IN INTERNATIONAL SUPERVISORY COMMISSIONS
FOR VIETNAM, LAOS AND CAMBODIA

6. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of July 22nd, said that, after studying the Indo-China cease-fire and armistice agreements which had been drawn up at the Geneva Conference, he was satisfied that the procedures envisaged by these agreements were workable and might result in a permanent settlement of the Indo-China problem. It was to be noted, particularly, that certain serious weaknesses in the Korean arrangements had not been repeated here. For example, under the Korean scheme, there were an equal number of Communist and non-Communist members, whereas the Indochinese arrangement involved the establishment of three International Supervisory Commissions, one each for Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia, and each Commission to consist of one member from India, Poland and Canada, with the Indian member the chairman in each case. These Supervisory Commissions would themselves have no enforcement obligations or responsibilities. Their functions would be solely supervisory, judicial and mediatory. Under Indian chairmanship, the Commissions would be responsible for supervising the proper execution of the provisions of the agreements by the two sides directly concerned functioning through joint commissions established by the armistice agreements. The Supervisory Commissions would assist the two parties in the interpretation of these provisions, would be available to settle the disputes and, in cases where disputes could not be settled, would report back to the members of the Geneva Conference. It was also expected that India, Poland and Canada would later be asked to assume responsibility for supervising elections.

The cease-fire and armistice agreements provided that the Supervisory Commissions would, in most cases, function by majority vote. It was only in matters concerning violations or threats of violation, which might lead to a resumption of hostilities, that the votes had to be unanimous. In such cases, and in the event unanimity could not be secured, the Commissions would submit majority and minority reports to the Geneva Conference for decision.

In addition to providing representatives for each of the three Supervisory Commissions, India, Poland and Canada would supply a number of military officers for fixed and mobile inspection teams which would supervise the execution of the cease-fire agreements in the field, under the direction of the Supervisory Commissioners.

In these circumstances, he felt that Canada should now formally accept the invitation to serve on the three International Supervisory Commissions, notwithstanding that the task to be performed would be exceedingly difficult, that the work of the Commissions would last for at least two or three years, and that Canadian participation would involve the commitment by the services of a relatively large number of Canadian civil and military personnel.

7. In the course of discussion, the following points emerged:

(a) Information had been received that both France and the United States were anxious that Canada accept the invitation. The United States did not propose to take any active part in settlement of the Indo-Chinese dispute, but welcomed Canadian representation on the Supervisory Commissions, as this would enable the United States to be kept reasonably well informed as to the progress being made on armistice arrangements. It seemed clear that if Canada did not accept the invitation, the whole difficult problem would be thrown open again without any assurance that a new panel of member countries could be devised which would be acceptable both to the Communist and to the Western countries.

(b) It was not unlikely that Canadian participation in the settlement of the Indo-Chinese dispute had first been suggested by India. In any event, there was probably no other Western country in a better position than Canada to work harmoniously and effectively with India.

(c) There were several factors which might lead to the conclusion that the Indo-Chinese armistice might be settled permanently under the procedures devised by the Geneva Conference. In the first place, these procedures would not likely give rise to the series of deadlocks which arose under the Korean arrangements. Furthermore, the Chinese had now demonstrated that they could defeat the white man and probably did not wish to resume fighting in Indo-China. This attitude was no doubt reinforced by the possibility that completely free elections would produce Communist regimes in Indo-China.

(d) It was suggested that the only hope of salvation for Asia was the election of truly national governments. For this reason, it was important that free elections be held in Indo-China even though such elections might result in the establishment of Communist regimes.

(e) It was noted that Canadian membership on the Indo-Chinese Supervisory Commissions would place Canada in a very difficult position, in view of the fact that the United Kingdom and the United States were so sharply divided in their policies regarding settlement of this issue.

(f) It was further noted that acceptance of the invitation to serve on the Supervisory Commissions did not flow directly from Canada's membership in the United Nations. In normal circumstances, a matter of this kind would be submitted to Parliament. However, a decision had to be taken urgently and it seemed clear that the government should accept the responsibility to serve in this case since such acceptance would likely prevent further bloodshed in Indo-China.

8. Mr. Pearson submitted a draft statement he proposed to issue to the press in the event the government agreed to accept the invitation of the Geneva Conference.

9. The Cabinet agreed that the invitation of the Geneva Conference that Canada serve with India and Poland on the three International Supervisory Commissions for Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia be now formally accepted and that an appropriate announcement be made immediately to the press by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.²³

I had an hour's discussion with Bedell Smith this morning, July 30, which I think was more fruitful than that which I had earlier with Murphy. McCardle was with me. I summarized the points which I had put to Murphy and the question which I had asked him (our telegram under reference). With a few additional questions from our side this proved sufficient to loose a number of interesting views from the Under-Secretary. I must confess that some of his views, which I would regard as particularly well-informed, make the Canadian task seem even more difficult.

2. Relationship of the United States to the Geneva Conference Declaration. Smith pointed out the obvious, that the United States did not subscribe to the Geneva Conference Declaration but simply promised in its unilateral declaration not to upset the resultant Indo-China armistice by the use of force. The United States Government however because of its general interest in the area and particularly because of its efforts to promote a defence organization directed primarily to the security of the area, would of course hope to be kept informed of developments arising out of the work of the Supervisory Commissions which will be of vital importance to the stability and security of Southeast Asia. Smith said that he was awaiting the advice of experts in the State Department as to the legal position of the United States in relation to Article 13 of the Conference Declaration. He thought, however, he could with some assurance give us an idea of the likely United States attitude on this matter.

3. The Geneva Conference had not operated as a voting conference. Objection to any proposal of importance by any member was sufficient to block agreement on the proposal. The United States had never liked the conception of the Geneva Conference existing as a body outside of the United Nations with continuing responsibility for Indo-China and Korea, and had refused to subscribe to that view during the course of the Conference. That attitude, he thought, would be maintained in the United States view, when the Supervisory Commissions were unable to reach unanimous agreement on an important matter they would have to report to all of the individual governments who had participated in the Conference at Geneva. The United States Government, for its part, despite its dissociation from the settlement would not be embarrassed by the receipt of such reports; in fact, Smith was of the opinion that the United States Government would expect to get such reports from the Commissions "automatically" along with the other eight governments. He thought, in addition, that the United States Government should be prepared to express its view on any report which was referred to it by the Commissions. He even believed that the United States Government could legitimately offer opinions on the work of the Commissions on its own initiative and not merely as the result of actual references. This did not mean that the United States would consult with the other members of the Conference to effect a solution; the United States Government could not, for reasons which were well known. On the other hand, the United States Government would, he thought, consult privately with the non-Communist members of the Conference. He said he thought we could assume that views which led to an impasse in the Commissions would be reflected in the views which the Commissions would receive from the nine governments; for that reason the Commissions would have to "write their own ground rules."

4. These opinions expressed by Bedell Smith cannot give us much comfort. They were given to us frankly as arising out of the facts of life as the Geneva Conference revealed them. I must stress, however, that they were given to us in sympathetic terms. If Smith's personal attitude is any guide, we can expect co-operation from the United States within the hard limits imposed by circumstances, in the tasks which face us as a member of the Supervisory Commissions.

5. Prospects for the Commissions' success. Smith was not too sanguine that the Geneva Conference had produced a happy solution to the Indo-China problem and he thought the Commissions would be faced with extreme difficulties in their operations. It could be assumed that the Poles would vote the Communist line. In his opinion the Communist line would be overtly reasonable but directed at the covert subversion of the three Indo-Chinese states if not in two years at least as a long term aim. The Communists might be content in the short-term to neutralize the three states but he thought that their aim would be to leave them impotent to resist outright Communist control. At first glance, the work of the Commissions might be regarded as simple in that they had rather restricted functions of supervision of the cease-fire terms rather than guarantee or enforcement functions. Set against the political background, however, their operations would be anything but simple.

6. The Commissions would be faced with three different situations arising out of the degree of sovereignty which now seemed to exist for Viet Nam, Laos and Cambodia. Smith thought that this was one of the first problems which would arise. Cambodia, because of the forthrightness of its representatives in the closing hours of the Geneva Conference was left legally with almost complete sovereignty, Laos with somewhat clouded sovereignty and Viet Nam with highly disputable sovereignty. Cambodia might claim the right to do whatever it liked with respect to foreign military assistance. On the other hand, there would be a quandary as to whether, for example, the United States Military mission now in Viet Nam could stay.

7. The other obvious problem which could be expected to arise immediately concerned the decision as to whether unanimity of opinion was required on a particular subject. He thought we should not forget that the "built-in veto" in these circumstances might be as useful to the non-Communist cause as to that of the Communists even though he was certain that Canada, for example, had as little stomach for the use of such tactics as did the United States. Aside, then, from the ever-present obstructionist tactics of the Communists, the important facts in the success or lack of success of the Commissions would be the strength of the Canadian and Indian attitudes. This in turn suggested the great importance of the Indian stand, in Smith's view, since he was certain that the United States Government would respect the "conscience" of the Canadian representatives. He hoped that the senior Indian representative would not only be objective but also that he would have the ear of Mr. Nehru. Smith said that he was not nearly as concerned with the Indian record as were some of his colleagues. He had had a toting up made of Indian votes in opposition to the United States on important issues in the United Nations and was prepared to regard the attitude that India always voted against the United States as "poppycock". His personal views on where India stood, however, did not blind him to the fact that an Indian representative could be chosen who would be biased in favour of the Communist side.

8. "Secret" agreements. We were led by vague suggestions of possible secret agreements additional to the cease-fire agreements appearing in the telegrams which you have referred to us, to ask Smith if he had any knowledge of hidden agreements which might exist between the French and the Vietminh. He said he knew of none and that he had had the solemn promise of Mendes-France that the United States would be kept informed of all agreements made with the Communists. He believed that confusion might have arisen in some minds with respect to secret agreements as a result of the extremely private talks which the French had with the Communists in the course of the military staff meetings. He said that these talks had gone on for some weeks and that they, rather than United States absence from the Geneva Conference, had been responsible for the recess in the Conference activities.

9. At this stage of our conversation he added that it was his conviction that Chou En-Lai's visit to India and Burma in the course of the recess had materially affected the outcome of the Conference. Smith had been convinced that Molotov was prepared to see the French effort at negotiations fail and the over-turn of the Mendes-France government. In Smith's opinion the "straight talk" which Chou En-Lai had been exposed to in India and Burma swung the balance and permitted the Conference to continue. It was a question, of course, as to whether one could think of the Conference as successful. In any case, it was only after Chou En-Lai's return to Geneva that progress was made in the private discussions between the French and the Communists. Smith said it was possible that specific views exchanged in the French-Vietminh talks might come to haunt the operations of the Supervisory Commissions, but he repeated his belief that there was nothing in the way of secret agreements entered into by the French.

10. Smith was obviously impressed with the sincerity and probity of Mendes-France, but was concerned that his lack of experience in Foreign Affairs might cause him to have to rely on civil servants in whom, Smith at least did not have the same confidence. He thought it unlikely that De Margerie, for whom he had great respect, would be closely associated with Mendes-France because of his former close association with Bidault. This would suggest the rise in influence of Parodi of whom Smith has no very high opinion. He had known Parodi on occasion to work directly against the policy of his government, a luxury which, said Smith, was not allowed to civil servants.

11. The character of the Commissions' activities. We asked Smith how he would regard the division of labour in the Commissions' operations between civilian and military representatives. He said he did not think that the basic intention of the agreements were military in character. It was unfortunate in his view that the International Commissions had not been given supreme authority over the implementation of the cease-fire agreements. The United States delegation had tried hard but without success to bring about this result. Smith prophesied that there would be a good deal of trouble because of the lack of clear-cut authority on the part of the International Commissions over the Mixed Commissions. The latter could be expected to be in continuous disagreement among themselves. He thought it would be extremely useful if by some means or another the International Commissions could gain some recognition as having a quasi-judicial role with respect to disputes which would inevitably arise in the Mixed Commissions, although he realized that this would be a difficult, if not impossible, job. Smith was not impressed with General Salan, the Senior French Military Representative on the Mixed Commissions. He thought he was a man entirely lacking in determination.

12. Once again, in Smith's opinion, the success or lack of success of the Commissions' activities would depend in large measure on the Canadian and Indian representatives. The situation suggested that the service representation from these two countries should be made up of senior and experienced officers prepared to outmanoeuvre or out-wait Communist obstructionism. Smith believed that the need for military services was immediately apparent aside from the service representation at high levels on the Commissions. He believed that medical units, communications units, supply and transport units, as well as security guards would have to be provided.

13. Service of Experts. We asked Smith's opinion on Reid's suggestion that an approach might be made to the United Nations for the service of experts on South-east Asia. Smith thought that this would be a good idea and would in fact fit the United States view that the United Nations should be associated, wherever possible, with the settlement in Indo-China. He expected, however, that any such suggestion would not be accepted by Communist China. As things stood the three governments who would serve on the Commissions had been requested to serve by the members of the Geneva Conference. The situation was quite different from that which had applied in Korea where the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission members had served under the aegis of the United Nations and not necessarily as representatives of their governments. It was clear that the representatives to the Indo-China Supervisory Commissions would serve as representatives of their governments and this might make difficult acceptance of the view that outside experts could be employed.

14. Relationship to the United Nations. In reading carefully the statement issued by the Canadian Government at the time of its acceptance of the invitation to serve in Indo-China (your press telegram 10 of July 29),²⁴ as we requested him to do, Smith expressed his personal satisfaction at the indication of Canadian regret that the settlement in Indo-China was not directly under the aegis of the United Nations. The United States delegation to the Geneva Conference had made every effort to have the settlement brought under United Nations surveillance but the Communists successfully resisted this move. Smith pointed out that Krishna Menon himself had offered a formula which the United States had supported but which had not been accepted. Menon's formula was that the Geneva Conference should issue an informal invitation to Canada, India and Poland to serve on the Supervisory Commissions and that those countries would accept the invitation on the condition that their service have the blessing of the United Nations. Smith did not rule out the possibility that some relationship might be established between the United Nations and the Supervisory Commissions as a result of activities at the next session of the General Assembly. Such an operation, of course, would be fraught with difficulties not only on the Communist side but also so far as the United States itself was concerned. It would inevitably involve the question of Communist Chinese membership in the United Nations. This was an area in which we got the impression that Smith was only thinking out loud.

15. Budget. In the closing moments of our conversation some brief attention was paid to the question of the budget of the Supervisory Commissions. We mentioned that we had heard of a United Kingdom suggestion that members of the Conference might share the costs of operations in Indo-China. Smith said that the United States simply could not subscribe to Mr. Eden's view. No legislation existed under which funds could be provided and it would be impossible, both from the point of view of time and political opinion, for the Administration to seek special legislation to cover such payment. It might be possible in his opinion for the United States to grant some financial assistance if the Commissions were associated more directly with the United Nations.

16. Smith's remarks on related Far Eastern matters will be reported in separate telegrams.† We were left with the impression that Smith would do all he could within the limits of the policies of his government to be of assistance to us. As the problems in the operation of the Commissions become more evident to you, therefore, you might wish to suggest points which I could suitably raise with him. His natural good sense, his influence with the President and Mr. Dulles and last but not least his wide experience in military and foreign affairs suggest that we make as much use as possible of his opinions and advice.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

INDO-CHINA COMMISSIONS — PREPARATORY TALKS IN NEW DELHI
AUGUST 1 TO 6

The meetings went better than we had expected. Krishna Menon was an admirable chairman. The Polish representatives could scarcely have been more cooperative. The meetings were informal. We did not even adopt an agenda. All decisions were agreed ones. There were, of course, differences of approach or of emphasis but there were more differences between the Poles and the Indians than between the Poles and ourselves.

2. It is reasonable to assume that the Poles were under instructions to be cooperative. The Polish representatives obviously liked playing this role.

3. The most important decision taken was that the agreements required the setting up of the three Commissions on August 11 the date on which hostilities in the whole of Indo-China cease. There had been confusion on this point.

4. The second most important decision was to send a three nation advance mission to Indo-China composed in part of members who would remain at least temporarily in Indo-China to form the nucleus of the three commissions and in part of members who would return to their respective countries to report to their governments.

5. The third most important decision was that the Commission for Viet Nam would be installed and commence its work at Hanoi. This did not seem to commend itself to the Viet Nam representative who suggested that political motives (demanded?) the decision, but his views were not shared by other members of his delegation. The French representatives were satisfied as well as the Poles and Viet Minh. The Chairman took every opportunity to emphasize that we had not taken final decision on the location of the Viet Nam headquarters. It will be left to the Commission to determine where it wishes to locate and how long it wishes to remain at Hanoi. To begin with, it may be best if it is itinerant. We were all in agreement (Poland/India/Canada) that at the outset the most practical place for the Commission to commence its work was in Hanoi because of the present nearby of the Trung Gia Commission and the High Commands. I am not suggesting, however, that the Poles, Viet Minh, Viet Nam and possibly the French did not have more devious reasons for taking the attitudes which they did. The motives behind each of the interested parties were obscure.

6. The estimates which were made of personnel requirements were, we think, as accurate as can reasonably be expected at this stage. Since the subordinate bodies of the Commissions, including the inspection teams, operate as three nation units, it is essential that each of the three nations operate on the basis of these estimates until they are changed by common agreement. The most important of the agreed estimates is that there are likely to be in the whole of Indo-China 26 mobile inspection teams in addition to the 26 fixed inspection teams and that each mobile team should be composed of one officer from each country and that each fixed inspection team should be composed of two officers from each country. This means a minimum of 78 officers from each country. The second important estimate is of the minimum number of people required on each national delegation at each of the three headquarters. It was considered that the minimum establishment would be a representative of ambassadorial rank, a senior political adviser who would be deputy representative, a junior political adviser, a senior military adviser with the rank of Major General, a junior military adviser and an administrative officer. The minimum confidential staff required would be two confidential stenographers, two confidential cypher clerks and two guards. This makes a total of (group corrupt).

7. We urge that in addition each of our national delegations include a first class public relations officer since it is essential that, if there is disagreement among the members of the Commission or between some or all members of the Commission and local authorities, the position of the Canadian representative be fully and clearly explained to the press. This cannot be done by the normal staff of the Canadian delegation on a Commission since the need for briefing will arise at the very time when the members of the staff will presumably be dealing with a crisis of some sort.

8. Our national delegation to the Viet Nam Commission should be built up to full strength as soon as possible. Our delegations in Laos and Cambodia may need only one political adviser each and one military adviser each.

9. India was anxious to provide the Secretary-General of each Commission and the whole of each Commission Secretariat other than Deputy Secretaries General and, of course, interpreters and translators and subordinate staff locally recruited. The alternative was a Secretariat composed equally of Indians, Poles and Canadians. It would have been difficult for us to have found the Canadian component; the efficiency of the administration would have been affected and the ability of the Poles to create mischief would have been increased. We were therefore prepared to accept the Indian offer. The Poles, however, insisted on the right to provide members for the Secretariat. We expect, in spite of this, that the Secretariat will be composed substantially as the Indians intended.

10. The Poles wanted to restrict employment in the Secretariat, including employment of high grade interpreters and translators, to nationals of the 3 countries. The compromise was that every effort would be made to fill the posts from nationals of these 3 countries but if this could not be done, nationals of other countries would be employed. The Poles, we think, will not object to Swiss interpreters and translators but there are nationalities to which they probably would object.

11. Since it is likely that the only Canadian on the Secretariat of a Commission will be a Deputy Secretary General, a heavy responsibility will rest on him. He will have to do his best to ensure that the Secretariat acts with impartiality. Qualities of shrewdness and persistence are required.

12. The English translation of the agreements states that the Secretaries General of the 3 Commissions are responsible 'for coordinating their work and for relations between them'. The French text, which is authentic, gives the responsibility to the 'Secrétaires Généraux'. According to the Poles, the 'Secretariat General' consists of the Secretary General and the Deputy Secretaries General. This means either that the coordinating body will consist of 9 persons, 3 from each nation represented on the Commission, or that, so far as coordination is concerned, each Commission Secretariat would be run by a sort of praesidium consisting of the Secretary General and his 2 deputies. We may have to accept one of these alternatives. We came across the error in the English translation only towards the end of our discussions and did not have time to settle the question. We have, however, done our best to avoid the danger that each Secretariat will be administered by a praesidium of 3 by including in the provisional rules of procedure for each Commission that the Secretary General is 'in charge' of the Secretariat.

13. We also insisted successfully that all the members of the International Secretariats, including the Secretaries General, are international civil servants as distinct from the representatives on the Commissions who are delegates of national governments. This should make it easier for us to complain of inefficiency or partiality and, if necessary, to demand removal.

14. The formula on the sharing of costs is, we think reasonable. Each country meets the pay and allowances of its national delegation and of its officers on the inspection teams. All other costs, including travelling expenses, are charged to the international budget. It is for the Joint Chairmen of the Geneva Conference on Indo-China to raise the funds for this budget. The 3 countries are responsible only for making initial advances to the international budget pending the receipt of funds raised by the Joint Chairmen.

15. Each country represented on the Commissions has opportunities for intelligence work. It is to be assumed that the Poles will take advantage of this and the decision to permit them to send 3 technical personnel (ostensibly interpreters and cypher clerks) to each fixed team and 4 to each mobile team will facilitate their task. Some of these 'Polish' technical personnel will doubtless be Soviet agents and the Polish equivalent of the NKVD whose job it will be to keep an eye on the Polish officers. This decision is, however, an inevitable consequence of the necessity of including Poland on the Commissions. We provided for India and Canada sending similar technical personnel if they wished.

16. The operation of Polish and Soviet agents will be facilitated by the use of cypher facilities by the Polish element of inspection teams, as well as by the Polish delegation to each Commission but the Polish request for these facilities was not unreasonable and could not in our opinion be opposed. The Poles at first wanted in addition their own direct wireless communication with Warsaw a request which Krishna Menon vehemently opposed as casting aspersions on the good faith of India but we think the Poles will be satisfied if the Indians do provide a direct wireless service to Warsaw which they can use.

17. We thought it wise not to raise formally at the New Delhi meetings the nature and extent of the functions and tasks of the commissions in relation to political matters. We did, however, raise this informally with Krishna Menon since he had given us the impression that he had not given adequate consideration to the responsibility or the right of the Commission to investigate a complaint for example, that the North Viet Nam authorities were taking reprisals or discriminating against the Roman Catholic groups in the north or preventing them from moving to the South. After consideration Krishna Menon agreed with us that in Viet Nam, for example:

(a) The International Commission has the duty, under Articles 28 and 29, of ensuring the control and supervision of the execution by the parties of the whole of the agreement without distinction between its political and its military clauses;

(b) That among the political clauses are the undertakings of the parties in Article 14 to refrain from reprisals or discriminations and to permit and help civilians to move from the North Zone to the South Zone and vice versa; and

(c) That the commanders of the forces of the two parties are required under Article 25 to afford full protection and all possible assistance and cooperation to the International Commission in the performance of these functions and tasks.

18. My personal view, which I think Macdonnell shares, is that these are not matters which could best be handled by the inspection teams, both because military officers are not necessarily best fitted for these tasks and because the right of mobility of inspection teams as well as their duties are limited (see for example Article 35 of the Viet Nam Agreement). There is no limitation either in the International Commission itself. Consequently it will probably be found that complaints of the violation of the political clauses of the Agreement should after some kind of screening, be heard either by the Commission itself or by subcommissions appointed by it. The sub-commissions would presumably consist of the political advisers to the Commissioners.

19. Since the chief political difficulties are likely to arise in Viet Nam this makes it all the more important that the political advisers to our representative on the Viet Nam Commission should be carefully chosen.

20. The Indians, and probably the Poles, intend privately to give their representative on the Viet Nam Commission general supervision over their representatives on the other two Commissions. We would be well advised to do the same. This means that Canadian policy on the three Commissions would be coordinated by you on the advice of the Canadian Commissioner in Viet Nam or by the Canadian Commissioner in Viet Nam under your direction.

21. We were much impressed by the efficient planning of the Indian military and by the willingness of the Indian military to accept difficult and heavy responsibilities in assisting the three Commissions. The Indian military will be responsible for coordinating transportation, operating the communications and providing guards for the headquarters of the Commissions. Chaudhuri, Chief of the General Staff and A.M. Engineer, Deputy Chief of Air Staff, ably represented the Indian military at our meetings. Rutledge and Morton have already established friendly relations with the senior Indian officers. We are confident that our officers will find it easy and pleasant to work with the Indian officers and that the cooperation between the two armed services in Indo-China will strengthen the good relations between the armed forces of our two countries.

22. It is of course essential that our officers on the inspection teams do their best to establish friendly relations with the Polish officers, both because the inspection teams will not be able to operate effectively unless the officers concerned show a spirit of mutual accommodation and goodwill and also because the Indian head of each inspection team will be put in a difficult position if his Polish and Canadian colleagues are not on good terms.

23. The appointment of Dutt, Commonwealth Secretary, to head the advance team to Indo-China indicates that he will have the continuing responsibility in the Ministry of External Affairs here on questions relating to the three Commissions in Indo-China. We have found him friendly, reasonable and intelligent. We have no reason to believe that he or the three Indian Commissioners are tainted by xenophobia or by Communism. We are not satisfied, however, that the Commissioners are strong men or men of first class ability. If their Polish colleague is strong and the Canadian is not there is therefore danger they may unconsciously be unduly influenced by the Pole. The head of the Polish delegation at the New Delhi talks is the Polish representative on the Viet Nam Commission. He impressed us as able and forceful and he also has charm, a dangerous combination.

24. Some of the discussions of the Conference will probably create difficulties. We worked too quickly and we were working from documents which had themselves been hastily drafted. If we had had more time to consider the problems, some of the decisions, if not different, might have been more precise. We tried to ensure against errors by including in the record of our decisions that they should be interpreted broadly.

25. We left unchallenged a Polish contention that the Commissions and their subordinate bodies must operate with all their representatives present. Fortunately there is no formal decision recorded on this point nor is it spelt out in the rules of procedure. It is clearly absurd since it would give any member a veto even on a procedural decision. In order to exercise his veto he would merely have to leave the room.

26. We did not discuss how the Commissions should appeal to the members of the Geneva Conference on Indo-China. We assume that the Commissions, through their Chairmen, would send identical communications to the Co-chairmen of the Conference.

27. It is a sad commentary on the decline of the United Nations that so far as we know no one has drawn attention to the fact that most, if not all, of the work which we did this week in our meetings in New Delhi was clearly work which, under the intent of the Charter of the United Nations, should have been done by the United Nations itself. Obviously, until the time has come when representatives of the Peking Regime can be seated in the United Nations, work which properly belongs to the United Nations will have to continue to be done by such ad hoc, and I am afraid, amateur bodies.

INTERNATIONAL SUPERVISORY COMMISSIONS IN INDO-CHINA

In the course of a recent interview with Everett Drumright, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs, on the future of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission in Korea,²⁵ the activities of the Supervisory Commissions in Indo-China were discussed. We have already reported (our telegram under reference) Drumright's view that action in Korea to force stricter Communist adherence to the terms of the Armistice Agreement would have a salutary effect in Indo-China.

2. Drumright went on to say that the State Department was "disturbed" by some of the reports which it had received from Indo-China concerning the inability of the Commissions to oversee effectively the implementation of the cease-fire agreements.²⁶ He mentioned a few matters which were of particular concern to the State Department in this respect; the flow of arms and equipment into northern Viet Nam, the impressment of Laotians into the Viet Minh forces, the situation in the two northern Laotian provinces of Phong Saly and Sam Neua²⁷ and the question of possible Commission activity with respect to elections in Cambodia.²⁸ He said in addition that he had just seen a report that an escaped prisoner of war who had appeared before the Commission had been given back into the hands of the Viet Minh authorities.²⁹ No opportunity was given us at this meeting to follow up the discussion of the work of the Commissions in Indo-China to any great length.

3. We ourselves, however, were sufficiently disturbed by these comments from a senior State Department officer to take up the matter again with other responsible officers in the State Department. The transmission to the State Department of the summary of Commission activity contained in your telegram EX-1927 of October 20† gave us an ideal opportunity to raise the question again with Paul Sturm, former United States Consul in Hanoi, who is temporarily at the Indo-China Desk in the State Department. The summary report under reference was devoted in part to a description of the Commission's handling of the case of an escaped prisoner of war.

4. Sturm said that he felt certain that Drumright had not intended his remarks to be taken as criticism of the Commission's activities in Indo-China. He was certain in particular that Drumright did not wish to imply any criticism whatsoever of the Canadian members of the Commissions. The State Department fully appreciated the difficulties under which the Commissions were operating, and realized that the Commissions might not be able to deal satisfactorily with some of the problems which would arise. The State Department was disturbed rather by the situation in Indo-China than by anything which the Commissions were or were not doing. Sturm hoped that, on this occasion and on other occasions which might arise, the Canadian Government would not object if the State Department "shared its concern" informally with us. Sturm then went on to speak in a slightly more detailed fashion of some of the matters which Drumright had raised.

5. He said that the State Department had received more or less regular reports from reliable sources that arms and munitions were being moved into Viet Nam from the north in contravention of the cease-fire agreement. Much of the material was of Czech origin. He said that most recent reports indicated that a considerable volume of this contraband was being moved through two points in northeastern Viet Nam, Dong Dang and Caobang. At neither of these points had provision been made for the stationing of a Commission team. Sturm was not certain whether these violations of the cease-fire agreement had been brought formally to the attention of the Commission although he assumed that some mention of them had been made to Commission members by the French. Sturm expressed the hope that, as soon as the Commission was in a position to investigate in this area, its representatives would make every effort to stop the shipments or at least to publicize the violations of the cease-fire agreement as widely as possible in the hope of bringing pressure on the Communists to abide by the agreement. Sturm's comments contradicted the report carried in the New York Times of October 20 of the remarks of Mr. Desai, the Indian Chairman of the Viet Nam Commission. Mr. Desai, according to the New York Times story, indicated on October 19 that no significant amounts of war material were crossing the border between Viet Nam and China. This press report appeared after our interview with Sturm and we will take the next opportunity which presents itself to discuss it with him.

6. With respect to the Commission's handling of the case of the escaped prisoner of war which is outlined in your telegram EX-1927,[†] Sturm expressed satisfaction at the efforts of the Canadian representative to protect the individual as much as possible by requiring that he be available to the Commission at all times. He was puzzled, however, as to why such an individual would be turned back to the Viet Minh authorities. If the individual was a bona fide prisoner of war who had escaped from the control of one or other of the parties to the agreement, Sturm thought that he should be covered by Article 21(a) of the cease-fire agreement for Viet Nam. Under the term of this Article all prisoners of war should have been liberated within thirty days after the date of the effective cease-fire, i.e. by the middle of August. It would be useful, I think, to have the comments of our representatives in the field on this point so that we might discuss it further with the State Department. It is quite clear from what Sturm said that, in the United States view, individuals should not be returned to Communist control if that can be avoided. He expressed the view that it might even be possible for the Commission to make some arrangements to hold such individuals in custody until their cases were disposed of.

7. The third point to which Sturm devoted some attention concerned elections in Cambodia. According to reports received by the State Department, the Indian Chairman of the Cambodian Commission had made clear publicly his belief that one of the Commission's tasks in Cambodia will be to oversee the next elections there. The Cambodian Government holds the view strongly that elections in Cambodia are of no concern to the Commission and that there is nothing in the cease-fire agreement which gives the Commission the right to intervene. The United States Government fully shares the Cambodian view. From the reports which have been received, United States authorities believe that if the Commission attempts to press this point the reaction of Cambodian authorities will be violent and immediate.

8. I assume that you would wish us to continue to sound out United States authorities on matters such as those dealt with above. We believe, as we are sure you do, that, in spite of the legal detachment of the United States from the Indo-China settlement and despite its lack of enthusiasm for the agreements reached at Geneva, it is important that United States views on the developing situation in Indo-China be given due weight. It may be that there will be criticism of the activities of the Commissions from American sources both official and unofficial which will involve implied criticism at least of the Canadian components of the Commissions. We feel certain, however, that interested United States officials at all levels in the State Department are fully appreciative of the task which Canada has taken on and have confidence that the Canadian representatives on the Commissions will do all that is humanly possible to make the Commissions effective in their supervision of the cease-fire agreements.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

New York, October 14, 1954

My dear Mike [Pearson],

Many thanks for your note.† Very sorry we will not have a chance of meeting. I leave New York tomorrow on the way back to Australia.

I had Monday and Tuesday last in Washington and had good talks with the senior State Department people on a number of subjects that concern us. Naturally, South East Asia was prominent in these talks. The particular conversation about which I am writing was one between McArthur (Counsellor to the Secretary of State), Young (Director, South East Asian Affairs) and myself.

Young said that they believed that the situation in two North East provinces of Laos demanded particular attention. There the Vietminh were transferring Laotians to Northern Vietnam, training them in Communist ideology and guerrilla tactics, replacing them by Vietminh Cochinese and, in turn, transferring the trained and indoctrinated Laotians back to Laos. Yost (United States Minister in Laos) reports that the Communists are clearly violating the armistice in those provinces. The State Department "knows" that the Poles and Vietminh are actively using the Control Commission as a legal "umbrella" throughout Indo China for propaganda, subversion etc. The Indians are by conviction inclined to pursue "active neutralism". Young said the Communists are obviously playing for time to "neutralise" all of Indo China. If individual states are "neutralised" in the Communist sense of the term (i.e. with active Communist subversion going on parallel to "neutralisation") the Western cause is virtually lost.

If the above is anything like a true picture, it sounds a serious business — and I thought you would not mind my bringing this conversation to your attention — although I would expect your people in Indo China to be well aware of what is going on. It places a considerable degree of responsibility on your Canadian representatives on the International Control Commission. As I have said, I would expect them to be well aware of the need to counter actively the alleged Polish-Vietminh tactics — and also to make a careful documentation of Communist violations, which may very well have an important part to play in subsequent events.

With best wishes to you.

Yours

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, November 1, 1954

My dear Dick [Casey],

Thank you for your letter of October 14 about your conversations with McArthur and Young in the State Department concerning Indochina. I appreciate very much your passing this information along to me.

Contacts of our own people in Washington with the State Department have provided us with some of the same information and impressions which you received in your interviews, and reports from our Commissioners in Indochina have confirmed and corroborated a good deal — but not all — of what has been said in Washington concerning the activities of the Viet Minh.

I must confess I am somewhat puzzled — and a little disturbed — by the remarks of the State Department officials that the Poles and the Viet Minh are using the International Commissions as a legal "umbrella" throughout Indochina for propaganda, subversion, etc. From the beginning we have regarded the Geneva agreements as providing primarily for a military settlement. The military clauses of all three agreements are fairly clear, and no insuperable difficulties have so far been encountered in their execution. This phase of the operation is going reasonably well, and while in a number of cases the Poles have been obstructive, there are few indications that they are actively attempting to sabotage the proper implementation of the military provisions of the agreements. The situation in North Laos is an exception to this, but the reason there, I think, is largely that the agreement for Laos left a number of very loose ends so far as the status of the northeast provinces is concerned.

It is, of course, quite obvious that the Viet Minh and the Poles are not observing the "spirit" of the agreement as we would like to see it observed. None of us could have expected that the Communists would regard the Geneva settlement as the summit of their ambitions in Southeast Asia, and that the Viet Minh would not use every device they can to establish themselves solidly in North Vietnam and to lay the foundations for future re-penetration into South Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos. There is, however, nothing in the cease-fire agreements that forbids propaganda — or, indeed, many types of subversion; and ipso facto there is virtually nothing that the Supervisory Commissions can do to put a stop to that sort of thing. If there is a legal umbrella for Communist propaganda and subversion throughout Indochina it is provided by the cease-fire agreements themselves, in those clauses which require both parties to refrain from reprisals and discrimination against persons or organizations on account of their activities during the hostilities and to guarantee their democratic liberties.

I do not mean to suggest that the Commissions have not very heavy responsibilities to ensure that the terms of the agreements are precisely carried out, or, if things do not go as we might hope, that the blame lies wholly with the negotiators at Geneva. I believe that our Commissioners should see to it that the Communists do not use the agreements as a means to prepare themselves for a further extension of their power in Indochina. In so doing, however, we have to be sure that we can carry the Indians along with us; furthermore, the Commissions for all practical purposes have only a moral authority and no executive powers or responsibilities.

So far as the Indians are concerned we have received encouraging reports. Their pursuit of "active neutralism" involves a most conscientious impartiality. There have been a few occasions in Vietnam when the Indians have departed from standards of true objectivity in an effort to meet Polish views half way and to seek compromises on disputed issues which will apportion blame equally to the French and the Democratic Republic sides, but on the whole we understand that most of the Indians endeavour to be truly impartial and objective. On the face of it this might not seem to serve the best immediate interests of the West in Southeast Asia, but in the long run it may well turn out to be a good thing. Asian neutralism is a phenomenon which we must accept; I doubt that it can be changed by open opposition, but I think that if we show some understanding of this attitude, and if the Communists do not change their ways, we will find in due course that the neutralism of some Asian countries will have an Irish touch to it — they will know who they are being neutral against. In Indochina the Poles are not playing according to the book, and are making no very convincing attempt to be impartial. Reports from our people in Indochina indicate that the Indians are rapidly becoming aware of this, and are entertaining fewer and fewer illusions about the Poles in particular and the Communists generally. Certainly those Indians who are serving in Indochina are getting a very useful education in the ways of the Communists, and we can hope that this will soon have its repercussions in New Delhi — and ultimately in Rangoon and Djakarta.

I believe the best contribution Canada can make in Indochina is to pursue a line of scrupulous adherence to the terms of the agreements, without any abandonment of the basic principles of our foreign policy. By this means we can I think gain and keep the confidence of the Indians, and so ensure that on important issues that come before the Commissions in Indochina they will be likely to take the same attitude as ourselves. We have already had indications that this is in fact the way things are working out. If we are to have any influence on the course of events in Indochina we must see to it that the Indians are with us. Otherwise, the future of the Commissions would be placed in jeopardy and the future of the Indochina States would even be more grim than it appears to be now.

Furthermore, by seeking to have the cease-fire agreements observed to the letter we can, I believe, do our best service to the three free states in Indochina and to our good friends in SEATO. Successful implementation of the cease-fire agreements will buy some valuable time for Laos, Cambodia and South Vietnam — time for them to organize their internal security and to build up their power to resist Communist pressures in the future. In these tasks they will require outside assistance, which the United States — and I hope the other SEATO powers — are prepared to give them.

Yours sincerely,
L.B. PEARSON

INDOCHINA — INTERNATIONAL SUPERVISORY COMMISSIONS

The attitude which the State Department is taking towards our activities on the International Supervisory Commissions as expressed by Sturm is interesting. When passing to the State Department our summary of communications received this week from Indochina (which is going forward in a separate telegram)† you might express to them our appreciation for “sharing their concern” with us about developments in Indochina. We do not, of course, wish them to go beyond this.

2. You might point out to the State Department that while we are glad to have information concerning the movement of war material into North Vietnam, our Commissioner would have great difficulty in raising the matter in the Commission on his own initiative. It would be up to the French or the Vietnamese to make a complaint to the Commission, providing as much as possible in the way of detail as to the time and routing of the arms imports, quantities, types etc. Our Commission will then be able to press for the necessary investigations.

3. Our summary telegram contains more information concerning the escaped French prisoner of war. We are expecting further details on this case and will pass them on when they are available.

4. We have no comments to make at the moment on the question of the elections in Cambodia. We have received reports from Phnom Penh on this subject and are now considering them.

[Ottawa], November 10, 1954

Recent telegrams from Indochina, and despatch No. 1828 of October 25 from Washington, have worried me somewhat, as I know they have worried you and Mr. Holmes, about certain developments in the work of the armistice commissions in Vietnam and Laos.

The Polish representatives, after an initial period of co-operation, seem to be moving toward the prejudiced and obstructive line followed by Communists on such bodies. There have already apparently been one or two cases in which they have deliberately attempted to obstruct action which seems to have been required under the terms of the armistice.

I notice that the Indian representative is intensely preoccupied with preserving the unanimity of the decisions of the commissions, and that our own representative shares that desire. This is perfectly legitimate, of course, and we should go as far as possible to avoid division, but we should be very careful not to go too far; to the point where the Poles are preventing the armistice arrangements being carried out. Unanimity is important, but the prevention of injustice and a strict adherence to the provisions of the agreement is even more important.

Our difficulty is that the Indian representative, in efforts to avoid open division, and in counselling delay and, on occasions, indecision, will very often have the support of not only his government, but of Indian public opinion. We are, of course, in a more difficult position and can expect uneasiness, both on the part of public opinion and in Parliament, when it reassembles, where a good many questions will be asked, if a situation develops, and becomes public knowledge, where the work of the commissions is hamstrung without strong protests on our part.³⁰

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

Naturally Commission's main job is get itself organized and accommodated and as much progress is being made as could be expected. There is a prospect that before very long there will be adequate office accommodation and communications facilities.

2. Commission, however, has had to face its first question of substance. We found the two sides deadlocked on the release of prisoners of war. The French wanted to start the exchange at once while the Democratic Republic refused to contemplate any exchange until they had received from the French complete lists of all those in French hands. To do this in a hurry presented technical difficulties for the French who had only been asked for these very detailed lists on August 7th. The Democratic Republic said it might be necessary to postpone the date for liberating prisoners if they did not receive the lists in time. Commission used its good offices and impressed upon both parties the importance for humanitarian and other reasons of starting the release of prisoners at the earliest date. We were able to make a unanimous suggestion (not a formal recommendation) which helped to bring the two parties together. We told the French that they must compile their lists as quickly as possible and we told the Democratic Republic that there could be no question of postponing the date laid down in the Agreement for the liberation in the free zone. French and Democratic Republic agreed on a compromise which looks workable and thanked the Commission for its help.

3. Clearly the prisoner of war issue is full of potential trouble but for the moment things are on the rails again.

Ottawa, August 24, 1954

Dear Mr. Lett:

You have been appointed Canadian representative on the International Supervisory Commission for Vietnam, which has been established in accordance with the terms of the Agreement on the Cessation of Hostilities in Vietnam which has concluded at the Geneva Conference on Indochina on July 20, 1954.³¹ As you know, the Commission commenced to function at Hanoi, on August 11, and since that time Mr. R.M. Macdonnell has been acting as the Canadian Commissioner on the Vietnam Commission. It would be appreciated if you would proceed to Hanoi as soon as possible to take up your duties, at which time Mr. Macdonnell will go to Phnom Penh to assume his functions as Canadian Commissioner on the International Supervisory Commission in Cambodia.

2. The task you will be undertaking on behalf of Canada of participating in the supervision of the cease fire in Vietnam, will be an extremely important and difficult one, and one for which there are no precedents in Canadian experience to guide you. You may rest assured, however, that you can count on the full cooperation and assistance of this Department. We will provide you with the best military and civilian advisers available, as well as the best possible facilities to enable you to do your task effectively.

Geneva Conference

3. Canada did not participate in the Geneva Conference on Indochina at which the agreements for the cessation of hostilities in Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia were drawn up. Canada was not a party to the agreements nor to the conference declaration issued by the Geneva Conference powers at the time the agreements were concluded. We have no responsibility for the content of the agreements nor for their execution or enforcement. The texts of the agreements have been passed to us by the co-chairmen of the Geneva Conference without gloss or interpretive comment, and we have been assured that there were no verbal or secret understandings concerning the interpretation of the agreements between the parties concerned. You may, therefore, take them at their face value.

³¹ Pour l'accord du cessez-le-feu, voir France, Ministère des Affaires étrangères, Conférence de Genève sur l'Indochine (8 mai-21 juillet 1954), Paris, Imprimerie nationale, 1955, pp. 453-460. For the ceasefire agreement, see United Kingdom, Parliamentary Papers, Cmd. 9239, Further Documents relating to the discussion of Indo-China at the Geneva Conference June 16-July 21, 1954, London, Her Majesty's Stationary Office, 1954, pp. 27-40.

4. You may have received various impressions concerning the significance of the agreements in relation to the future course of events in Southeast Asia. Our own appreciation of the situation in Indochina at the time of the Geneva Conference was that the French military hold on northern Vietnam was slipping rapidly, and that the French-sponsored government of Vietnam had not achieved the degree of popular support essential for stability or for its continued effectiveness. We considered that proposals for military intervention by other powers to restore French military control were foredoomed to failure, and that attempts to bolster the Vietnamese Government by such military intervention might well have led to the outbreak of wider international hostilities.

5. Accordingly it is our view that the cease-fire agreements — while unsatisfactory from many points of view — were the best obtainable in the circumstances, since they were based on political and military realities. Whatever their defects, the agreements, if properly implemented, would prevent Laos and Cambodia from falling under Communist domination in the immediate future and would make possible a build-up of military and political resistance to further Communist encroachment in Vietnam south of the demarcation line. There is no question in our minds that if the military and political situation, as it was three months ago, had continued it would have resulted within a fairly short time either in a much more general and serious war or in the extension of Viet Minh control over the whole of Indochina.

Considerations Which led to Canadian Participation

6. Canada's collective security responsibilities in Southeast Asia are confined to those that arise from membership in the United Nations. While the principle of collective security on a regional basis is applicable to Asia as to other areas, we have emphasized that a NATO pattern pact might not fit the facts of Southeast Asia. Nor have we given any encouragement to the idea of Canadian participation in such a pact. We have no special regional interests in Indochina, and few contacts with it which would warrant taking on special commitments at this time outside the United Nations. Australia and New Zealand, without any other regional commitments such as NATO and with interests and obligations already accepted in that area, are in a somewhat different position. Canada's acceptance of the invitation to participate in the supervision of the cease-fire agreements was dictated simply by the Government's desire to contribute by this kind of service to the establishment of peace and security in Southeast Asia. Moreover, the invitation was accepted only when it was clearly understood that the Supervisory Commissions would have no executive responsibilities with respect to the cease-fire agreements, and that Canadian acceptance did not involve us in any obligations to guarantee or enforce the agreements. These responsibilities and obligations are those of the Geneva Conference powers who have accepted them.

Functions of the Commissions

7. The functions of the Supervisory Commissions are set forth in Chapter VI of the agreement. Briefly they are supervision, observation, inspection and investigation in connection with the applications of the provisions of the agreement, particularly in relation to:

1. Movement of armed forces as provided for in the regroupment plan;
2. the demarcation lines between the regrouping areas and the demilitarized zone;
3. release of prisoners and civilian internees;
4. introduction into the country of military personnel and of all kinds of arms, munitions and war materials.

8. It is clear from the agreements that the International Supervisory Commission's functions are supervisory, judicial and mediatory. It makes recommendations to the parties of the agreement, but it has no power of itself to enforce these recommendations. If one of the parties refuses to put into effect a recommendation of the International Commission, the Commission will inform the members of the Geneva Conference.

9. The Commission will presumably draw up its own rules of procedure, a matter which will require great care to ensure that opportunities for obstruction by the Poles are kept to an absolute minimum. We have no particular observations to make on the matter of procedure at the present time, though we would draw your attention to Article 42 of the agreement, which provides that on questions concerning violations or threats of violations which might lead to a resumption of hostilities the decisions of the Commission must be unanimous. The procedural question arises as to how it will be decided that a given question comes within the terms of Article 42. Our preliminary view is that the Chairman of the Commission should decide when the rule of unanimity should apply. This would accord with normal conference procedure. We would hope that the Indians would decide this matter in a manner which would agree with our own view of the situation more often than not. On the general question of procedure, it will be necessary for you to bear in mind some of the Canadian policy objectives which are discussed elsewhere in this letter.

Status of Commissioners

10. The status of the Commissioners vis-à-vis their Governments in relation to their functions on the Commission is not defined anywhere in the agreement nor in the invitation to the Canadian Government. The agreement states in Article 34 that the International Commission "shall be composed of representatives of the following States: Canada, India and Poland". In the invitation issued by the co-chairmen of the Geneva Conference, the Canadian, Indian and Polish Governments were requested to "designate representatives to form the International Supervisory Commissions". Although the function of the Commission will be in a sense judicial, the basic documents do not suggest or require that the Commissioners act on the Commissions in their individual capacities, nor do they suggest or require that the Commissioners be merely agents of their respective Governments.

11. Nevertheless it seems clear that it will be necessary for you to act on your own independent judgment in relation to most disputes which come before the Commission, since the evidence would be available only to you. In dealing with such matters as come before the Commission, you will keep in mind the general considerations set forth in this letter and any subsequent advice and guidance which we send to you from time to time. We hope that in important matters you will keep us fully informed by telegram, and that where possible you will seek advice from Ottawa before taking decisions which will involve the exercise of the veto or are likely to give rise to subsequent reference to the conference powers. Except on matters of the gravest import we would not wish you to hold up the work of the Commission in order to obtain instructions from Ottawa, and you should do everything possible to discourage the other Commissioners from rendering the Commission inoperative for this reason. In general, the problem of when and when not to refer matters to Ottawa is one which will have to be left to your own discretion and judgment for solution.

12. While it will no doubt be assumed — and correctly — that Canada's representatives on the three Commissions will reflect a Western outlook in their approach to the problems which the Commissions will have to solve, it is important that they should at all times do their utmost to maintain an attitude of judicial impartiality in the performance of their duties. We have no particular axe to grind in Southeast Asia, and are fortunate in having no history of unpopular policies or attitudes there in the past. There are, however, certain broad policy objectives with respect to Southeast Asia which you will wish to keep in mind in carrying out your duties, and which are outlined below.

Canadian Policy in Southeast Asia

13. The first objective of Canadian policy is the maintenance of the peace in Indochina which has now been achieved. Although there are many aspects of the settlement which are unpalatable to our friends and allies — and indeed to ourselves — and although it may contain the seeds of future troubles, it is based — as stated above — on a realistic recognition of the political and military situation in Indochina as it existed in May, 1954. The cessation of hostilities eliminates, for the time being at least, one of the most serious threats to the general peace of the world, and provides the time and opportunity for a fresh effort to encourage the development of stronger independent and non-communist states on the mainland of Asia.

14. A second objective is to encourage the development of a Southeast Asia Defence Organization, as a safeguard against and a deterrent to overt Chinese Communist aggression in Southeast Asia, in a way that will cause the least possible offence to the "neutralist" countries in the area, particularly India, Burma and Indonesia. If and when consulted by governments participating in the development of SEADO, we will direct our influence toward this end. It is, however, Canadian policy — as stated above — not to join SEADO. Our participation in the supervision of the Indochina settlement is an added reason for an abstention, which while justifiable, does, nevertheless, make inappropriate too active advice and counsel to others who are closer to the problem.

15. The third objective of Canadian policy in Southeast Asia is to contribute to the economic and social strengthening of countries in the area with a view to assisting their fuller human development. Such development should also help to eliminate conditions which foster the growth of Communism. Canadian participation in the Colombo Plan is a direct expression of this policy.

16. The fourth objective of Canadian policy is the encouragement by sympathetic interest of the development of strong, independent, non-Communist regimes on the Asian mainland outside present Communist areas. Despite our sympathy for France and the tremendous sacrifices she has made in the long struggle against the Viet Minh, it appears to us highly unlikely that the shoring up of France's remaining foothold in Indochina, particularly by means of external military aid, will do anything to halt — and may do something to assist — the extension of Communist influence. We must hope — without any excessive optimism that our hopes will be fully realized — that the progressive achievement of full independence under the protection which the cease-fire agreements should afford will enable Cambodia, Laos and Vietnam to resist effectively Communist attempts to take them over by means of infiltration and subversion.

Relations with the Indians

17. The Indian representative will be the Chairman of the Vietnam Commission, and your relations with him, and the relations of your staff with his staff both at the headquarters and on the inspection teams, will be of the utmost importance. Canada enjoys extremely good relations with India, based on our common membership in the Commonwealth, our common heritage of British institutions and a deep feeling of mutual respect. I am sure you will make every effort to continue this well-established tradition.

18. It will be desirable for you to understand and respect — even if you may not always approve — the main points of Indian foreign policy, which differ radically in many important respects from our own. The principal features of this foreign policy are non-alignment in the cold war between East and West, the strengthening and expansion of a “peace area” in South and Southeast Asia, vigorous, sometimes almost irrational opposition to “colonialism” and a sanguine acceptance of the optimistic interpretation of the Chinese Communist revolution. In ultimate objectives Indian policy does not differ radically from our own, in the sense that we both wish to avoid a general war and to see formerly dependent peoples achieve independence and free, as opposed to Communist, self-government. Our differences lie mainly in the means by which those ends are to be achieved. In this respect the Indians are strongly opposed to a Southeast Asia Defence Organization, which conflicts with their policy of non-alignment and the extension of their “peace area”; they are inclined to accept Communist China's assurance of good will more readily than we are, and they are inclined to view with hostile suspicion the motives which lie behind French and American policies in Asia.

19. In your informal contacts with your Indian colleague there should be no need for you to try to “sell” Canadian policies and attitudes nor to apologize for them. We would hope that India's experience in dealing with the Poles and with the local Communists will lead them to take a more sympathetic attitude towards policies supported by our allies and ourselves. You may also have opportunities to impress on the Indians that Senator McCarthy and Hollywood are not the only manifestations of the American way of life.

20. In the discharge of your official duties, an attitude of scrupulous fairness and impartiality and support for the strict observance of the terms of the cease-fire agreements will do more than anything else towards winning the confidence of your Indian colleague. Above all it will be vital to avoid giving the impression that you are attempting to "protect" French interests or to further American policy. This may present certain difficulties in view of the possibility that the Indian representative may be prejudiced against the French, and not too sympathetic to the U.S.A.

Relations with the Poles

21. Poland has no independent foreign policy: your Polish colleague on the Commission, therefore, will be acting in the interests of the USSR, Communist China, and the Viet Minh, probably in that order. These interests will not necessarily be identical. It is reasonable to assume that the USSR and Communist China both consider it in their interests at the present time to see that the cease-fire agreements are not upset, since, by negotiating these agreements they have successfully eliminated the threat for the time being of further American military intervention on the Asian mainland. Also they can be said to contribute to a relaxation of international tension which the Communists may hope to exploit in other ways. It may, nevertheless, be in the interests of the Viet Minh to violate the terms of the cease-fire agreements since the agreements, if successfully implemented, will prevent them from taking over the whole of Indochina as they had hoped to do. Both the USSR and China will probably be prepared to wink at such violations, unless or until a continual display of bad faith by the Viet Minh shows signs of seriously alienating the Indians; or otherwise interfering with the designs of Moscow or Peking. When this point is reached, China and the USSR may seek to restrain the Viet Minh.

22. All this suggests that the Polish representative may put on a devious performance on the Commission. He may combine a show of cooperativeness with varying degrees of obstruction, deceit and bad faith.

23. Nevertheless, you will wish to do your best to establish good working relations with your Polish colleague. Unnecessary or avoidable friction between yourself and him will only render the task of the Commission and particularly the Indian Chairman the more difficult. The Pole may use abusive phrases in referring to your views. This is the ordinary — though not invariable — practice of Communist negotiation. Experience has shown little is gained by meeting them on that level. Firm but polite replies, the exercise of restraint and the display of courtesy and good humour will make a more effective impression on your Indian colleague and possibly even on the Pole! It is Indian support you should seek to win in these circumstances rather than a propaganda or polemical victory over the Communists.

24. The Polish Commissioner as a good Communist, will probably have less power of discretion than either you or your Indian colleague, and most of the time will be acting under detailed instructions. You may find it valuable to get as accurate a picture as possible of his relations with the Viet Minh representatives.

Relations with the French

25. You will doubtless be having frequent official contacts with French military commanders and other French officials. The French will undoubtedly regard you as their "friend at court", and some of them may attempt on occasion to influence you in your work. The French Government does appreciate, I believe, the long-run value of your maintaining an attitude of judicial impartiality, but many individuals with whom you come into contact may not. Accordingly some friendly discretion may be necessary in your relations with them, particularly in your off-duty activities. The practice and attitude of your Indian colleague will have some bearing on the problem of the frequency and nature of your contacts — including social contacts — with the French.

Relations with the Americans

26. Though the Americans are not as intimately concerned with Indochina as are the French, you will wish to bear in mind, in your contacts with them not merely our very close and friendly relations with the United States, but also the demands of judicial objectivity and discretion, and the practice and attitude of the Chairman of your Commission.

Relations with the British

27. You will probably be having fairly frequent contacts with United Kingdom representatives in Vietnam. The United Kingdom maintains a legation in Saigon and a consulate in Hanoi, and since the United Kingdom is technically our “protecting power” in Indochina (since we have no diplomatic or consular representation there) you may have some business dealings with British representatives from time to time. You will bear in mind that the United Kingdom is one of the Geneva Conference Powers and that the International Commission will no doubt from time to time be communicating officially with the Conference Powers. While there should be no need to restrict unduly your contacts with British representatives, you will wish to avoid giving the appearance that you are seeking their advice or guidance in the execution of your duties. When local assistance is required in Saigon, you may wish to seek it from the Australian Legation there, as well as from the British Mission. We understand that the Australian Legation is under instructions to give Canadian officials in Indochina any help they may need.

Relations with the Local Authorities

28. Canada has recognized the independence of Vietnam within the French Union, but diplomatic relations have not been established. We have not, of course, recognized the “Democratic Republic of Vietnam”, as the Viet Minh call themselves, but our acceptance of the invitation to serve on the International Supervisory Commission for Vietnam does entail some measure of recognition of the Viet Minh as the provisional de facto governing authority in the north for the purposes of carrying out the terms of the agreement. You will doubtless have frequent contacts with officials of both governments. In view of Canada’s position on the Supervisory Commission, it will be desirable to keep your relations with the representatives of both governments on more or less the same official plane, though you will naturally feel more sympathy and friendliness toward the non-Communist regime.

Organization

29. As Canadian Commissioner, you will be in complete charge of all Canadian personnel attached to the Supervisory Commission and the inspection terms, both for purposes of policy guidance and administration. You will be assisted by civilian advisers appointed by the Department of External Affairs. You will find them of particular assistance in connection with the preparation of reports to Ottawa and on administrative procedures.

30. You will also be assisted by military advisers at headquarters appointed by the Department of National Defence, whose advice and counsel you will find particularly valuable since the problems with which you will be dealing will have important military aspects. The military personnel on the inspection teams, when working as members of the teams, will operate under the directions of the Supervisory Commission as a whole. For administrative and disciplinary purposes they will be under the command of the Senior Canadian military officer who will, in turn, be responsible to you. Expenditures made by all Canadian personnel at Commission headquarters and on the inspection teams which are not directly chargeable to the Commission itself will be made on your authority. We will be writing to you separately in more detail concerning some of these administrative matters.

31. A Canadian appointee will occupy the position of Deputy Secretary General in the International Commission Secretariat. He will be working under the direction of the Indian Secretary-General, but you will be responsible for giving him general guidance to ensure that Canadian interests are properly represented in the Secretariat.

32. In your work on the Commission you will doubtless find your own legal experience of considerable value. Some of the External Affairs officers of your staff have had legal training. In addition, you will have on your staff a legal adviser who will assist you in work connected with the interpretation of the cease-fire agreement and on such other matters as the legal status in Vietnam of Canadian personnel serving with the Commissions. For the present time no legal advisers are being appointed to the Commissioners in Laos and Cambodia, and at your discretion you may direct your legal adviser to provide them with any legal assistance they might require, permitting him to visit Phnom Penh and Vientiane if necessary.

33. You should maintain the closest possible liaison with your Canadian opposite numbers on the Commissions in Vientiane and Phnom Penh. It is hoped that communications facilities will be provided which will enable you to keep in touch with them by secure means, and where possible copies of your communications to Ottawa on subjects which will be of interest to them should be forwarded to the other two Commissioners.

Reporting to Ottawa

34. All official reports from the Canadian components on the International Commission and the inspection teams should be addressed to me or my deputy and should be signed by you or in your name. We will expect to receive from you all official records of Commission proceedings, together with reports from you giving your own interpretive comment; in the preparation of these reports, you will, of course, make use of the services and advice of your military and civilian advisers alike. We shall also be glad to receive from you reports from time to time on internal affairs in Vietnam — political, military, economic, etc. We will be giving you further guidance from time to time concerning the type of information we wish to receive. Facilities for telegraphic communication in cypher between Hanoi and Ottawa already exist, and we hope that an air courier service to carry classified documents between Hanoi and Ottawa will shortly be established. Brief reports of Commission activities and other important matters should be sent by telegram, and amplifying reports and other documents can be sent forward by security air bag.

Inspection Teams

35. A separate memorandum will be provided to you concerning guidance for the Canadian members of the inspection teams.³²

Canadians in Indochina

36. As of July 21, 1954, there were approximately sixty Canadian citizens in Indochina, according to information recently received from the United Kingdom Minister in Saigon and the Canadian Trade Commissioner in Singapore. Consular functions with respect to these people have been carried out and will continue to be dealt with by the United Kingdom Minister and Consul-General in Saigon. Any enquiries which you or members of your staff might receive for assistance of a consular nature should be referred to the United Kingdom Consular officers. You will be provided with a list of Canadians resident in Indochina with indications of their approximate location.

Security

37. A separate memorandum† is attached concerning security, which you and all advisers should read with care. You may take it for granted that the Communists will use all means available to them to secure information concerning the reports you are making and the instructions you are receiving, and consequently the precautions outlined in the attached memorandum are to be rigorously observed by all Canadian personnel.

38. On behalf of the Government I extend to you all our very best wishes for the success of your important mission, and my gratitude to you personally for the spirit of service to your country and to peace which has inspired you to undertake its leadership.

Yours sincerely,
L.B. PEARSON

TELEGRAM 35

Hanoi, August 31, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

CIVIL RIGHTS IN VIETNAM

I have raised in the Commission the importance of doing everything we can to see that the guarantees in Article 14 (c) and (d) are carried out. Freedom to move from one zone to the other is important to many in Vietnam, particularly the large number of Roman Catholics in the north. It is claimed by many that this right is not known or understood in the north, though there are contrary stories that the right is known but that people prefer to stay put. There are also charges that the Vietminh are exercising pressure and intimidation to prevent people going south.

2. In any event the first step is to see that Article 14 (c) and (d) is as widely published as possible. Thereafter comes the job of investigating complaints.

3. The Commission is therefore asking both parties to give the full publicity of press, radio and hand bills to a Commission announcement explaining in simple terms the rights afforded by the agreement. It concludes by saying that it will be the duty of the Commission to investigate any complaints that these or any other provisions of the agreement are not being faithfully carried out.

4. 48 hours after this request has been delivered to the French Union and the Vietminh Liaison Mission it will be released to the press.

LETTER NO. 32

PETITIONS AND COMPLAINTS

The more we think about the implications of the problem raised by these petitions, the more it seems to bring us closer to the essential responsibilities of the Commission, not only for the control of military equipment or personnel movements but also in relation to the problem of democratic freedoms and of the elections.

2. Already the Apostolic delegate, the Vietnam National authorities and the French Liaison missions have taken us into their confidence and expressed their great concern as to the fate of hundreds of thousands of Christians who are in Viet Minh-controlled territory and who are not given any facilities, indeed who are prevented from leaving for the South as they are entitled to.

3. All are agreed that the Commission had no choice but to refer complaints and petitions to the party concerned in the first instance: the alternative, for the Commission itself to undertake the investigation, would have implied a lack of faith in the two parties and would have required, as we pointed out in our previous letters, an expansion of the Commission services and personnel which are well beyond its present possibilities. Yet, even this first decision is not without its difficulties: if a complaint is referred to the Democratic Republic authorities, how can the Commission ensure that the persons concerned are not penalized? Obviously, as we pointed out in our letter of September 14 it would be fatal for the Commission's prestige if this were to happen but, clearly, it will be very difficult, perhaps impossible for the Commission to exercise effective control.

4. There is another difficulty: if one side or the other delays its reply or replies that there is no problem or that the problem has been exaggerated, what should then be the course of the Commission? To accept the answer without question may be to encourage or to sanction dishonesty. To undertake an investigation may be no less difficult: the Commission will have first to agree that one is desirable. And even if the Commission agrees that an investigation has to be undertaken, the authorities concerned will have to be given notice and the results may prove to be very disappointing.

5. To take a concrete example, let us suppose that a village of some four or five hundred persons sends a petition stating that facilities for moving South have been denied. All those with whom we have discussed the problem assure us that if a team is sent to visit the locality in question, none of the villagers will speak up: the Viet Minh can remove children or parents some distance away and those who are left behind will give every assurance that they are not Christians or that they are perfectly free but quite unwilling to move.

6. In fact, we are told by the French Liaison Mission that while they have considered this problem for some time, they have so far not been able to find any satisfactory solution. Their files are building up and they are reluctant to submit them to the Commission because of their fear of reprisals against those who have signed such complaints and petitions and because they do not see how the Commission will be in a position either to provide any protection or to check up effectively any answers which may be given by the Democratic Republic authorities.

7. For the time being, complaints are being received in very large numbers, mostly of course against the Vietnam National Government — this is no doubt due to the fact that the headquarters of the Commission are located in Hanoi — and it is not certain that the French High Command and the Vietnam National authorities will very readily co-operate in providing answers or that the Commission will have much greater facilities or success in investigations south of the 17th parallel: the French military forces are pulling out after a bad defeat and their mood is anything but co-operative. As for the Vietnam authorities, they seem to be very inefficient and inclined to drag their feet as much as they can in the execution of the Geneva agreement. The prospects of success and co-operation are not good on either side and I fear that fairly soon the Commission will be faced with inescapable, unpleasant and perhaps largely insoluble difficulties even if the present harmonious co-operation between the three members were to continue. The additional risk is that this spirit of co-operation may be subjected to critical stresses precisely when these crucial issues have to be solved.

8. The problems, it will be appreciated, which arise in connection with refugees are not different in essence, it seems, from those which will be encountered when the Commission attempts to ascertain the degree of democratic freedom enjoyed in various parts of the country and the prospects of holding an election which can give an objective indication of the views of the population. Here again the hard choice may be between the uncritical acceptance of the assurances given by both sides and the almost impossible task of carrying out effective investigations in an atmosphere of deceit and terror. I confess that, at this stage at least, I cannot yet see any clear answer to the dilemma.

9. This raises, of course, the question of the tasks to be assigned to the fixed and to the mobile teams; the Agreement itself envisages that their freedom of movement will be somewhat limited and that their responsibilities will be chiefly of a military character. It may be that, in order to perform its functions properly, later on, the Commission may call on these teams to undertake other duties, to check for instance, within their sphere of free movement, whether both sides have really informed the population as to the right to live in either zone. If agreement could be reached on this point, as we get nearer the elections, the duties of the teams in the political field might expand to the point where their composition might be re-examined; political advisers might be added to the team or they might replace some of their military members. The Commission will have to receive information of this nature not only concerning frontier areas but throughout the country, and it is a question whether both sides will be prepared to allow, later on, fixed and mobile teams concerned with the investigation of political conditions to move more freely, or whether other machinery, a civilian kind of team, will have to be developed.

10. I doubt whether these teams can ever become familiar enough with the country, whether they can know enough of the language to provide really conclusive evidence as to the real conditions. Perhaps in time Commission personnel will develop methods of enquiry, discover ways and means of affording some protection to those who will give them information, but, at best, within the two years which are to elapse before the elections, their effectiveness is not likely to be very great. Whether it will be sufficient to have a restraining influence remains perhaps the only hope. After all, if these teams accompanied by interpreters can move relatively quickly and freely, without notice, both sides may be compelled to be more moderate than they would have been in other circumstances and, in the end, this may be the modest measure of the Commission's success.

11. The above are only tentative views which have occurred to us as we are trying to assess the scope and the nature of a difficult problem. As new material becomes available and as the Commission acquires more experience, means of developing adequate solutions may suggest themselves more readily. It would be of assistance to us, however, if you could let us have your comments on the general approach we now envisage the Commission might adopt in dealing with this matter.

POLISH CO-OPERATION

On October 1 the Commission narrowly avoided its first split vote, with Canada and India on one side and Poland on the other. When the Polish member realized that he would be outvoted, he dropped his plan and produced a new one which was acceptable to the Indian and myself.

2. The issue was more far-reaching than might appear at first glance. The Commission had decided to send a mobile team to investigate a fresh incident in Central Vietnam, where people had been killed and wounded in an encounter between the local population and troops of the Vietnam army. A number of these disturbing incidents are under investigation by Commission teams. The Polish member proposed that the team being sent out the following day from Hanoi should be accompanied by liaison officers from both sides, as had been done on a previous occasion.

3. We have reported elsewhere on the strong French objections to having any sort of joint investigation of incidents in their zone and their serious reluctance to having even liaison officers or observers from the Democratic Republic present at investigations. They considered that such observers would be capable of stirring up a good deal of trouble, and they accepted the Commission's proposal for liaison officers on a previous occasion only because it was an essential part of a compromise which would overcome a deadlock in the Joint Commission and get an investigation started at once.

4. The Polish proposal was essentially an attempt to establish the principle that whenever the Commission conducts an investigation, liaison officers from both sides should be present. Since all the incidents so far have taken place in the French zone, and since it is unlikely that we will hear of many incidents in the zone of the Democratic Republic, this would be a one-sided arrangement and would enable officers of the Democratic Republic to be present at many points in Central and Southern Vietnam when Commission teams were conducting investigations. This would, to say the least, have an unsettling effect.

5. The Chairman opposed the Polish proposal with skill and patience. He explained that no precedent had been established when we attached liaison officers to our teams on a previous occasion; that had been a particular solution for a particular problem. In the present instance we had not been asked to act by the two parties, but had decided to conduct an investigation on our own initiative. The team was not intended to assess responsibility or apportion blame, but merely to obtain the facts as quickly as possible for the Commission's consideration. In his view there was no parallel between this case and the earlier cases where liaison officers had been attached to teams. I supported him and made the additional point that the Commission must retain freedom to conduct its own investigations as it wished, with or without liaison officers as the circumstances might require.

6. The Polish member argued in rebuttal that you could not have one type of investigation for one incident and a different type for another; all incidents must be treated in the same way. Then when he saw that the Indian and I were not going to alter our positions, he produced a new suggestion. He had earlier proposed that a team of political officers be sent to Central Vietnam to make a quick survey of what seemed to be going wrong. The Indian and I, while prepared to consider the proposal, were doubtful whether a quick trip of this sort would produce very useful results, and were inclined to think that it might be better to await a report from the team at Tourane. The Pole now proposed that we send a mobile team which would include political officers and would first of all confer with the fixed team in Tourane (which has had the assistance of Mr. Kilgour, the Canadian Deputy Secretary-General for more than ten days), and bring back a report on the progress they are making. The mobile team could then investigate the new incident if it liked. He made no further reference to a liaison officer from the Democratic Republic. This proposal was acceptable to the Chairman and myself, and early the following morning a team left for Tourane which included Major Leach, Canadian Army, and Mr. Crépault, political adviser.

7. It remains to be seen whether this near-dispute betokens a new and firmer Polish line.

PROGRESS REPORT

1. The commission held an important meeting on October 12.
2. Investigation of incidents in the south — the commission had a preliminary discussion on the 2 reports received so far from the teams which investigated these incidents. While it was agreed that final decisions should not be made before the third report from the Tourane team was received, the commission felt that no attempt should be made to assign blame but rather to make recommendations to prevent similar incidents in the future. I suggested that;
 - (a) both sides should be urged to take special precautions and to cooperate with the commission, as in Hanoi, for the hand-over of any area;
 - (b) that DR authorities should instruct their sympathizers not to encourage manifestations which might lead to difficulties;
 - (c) French Union forces should select and instruct carefully the units involved in these operations. The Polish Ambassador readily approved this suggestion.
3. Freedom of movement — while arrangements are being discussed for the setting up of a committee to deal with the problem as a whole, the French suggested that a special mobile team should be sent to one or two areas in the north where they have reason to believe large groups of persons wish to leave for the south. The commission agreed to send a team. A difficulty has arisen about whether it should be accompanied by liaison officers but both sides may be satisfied to be represented by their own interpreters.
4. Organization — the commission quickly reached agreement on a suggestion from the committee on fixed teams that these teams must have freedom to move widely through their areas and that the whole of Viet Nam should be divided into 14 areas to be allotted to the teams. The Polish representative readily agreed to this and pointed out that such a decision was in accordance with the wishes of both parties who have indicated that the teams were expected to travel continuously in the areas surrounding the points at which they are located.
5. Prisoners of war — the French liaison mission urgently requested the commission to send a special team to investigate a report that 600 Vietnamese prisoners of war were being held in a specified area in the north. The Polish representative agreed that the matter should be investigated but through a team of the joint commission in accordance with a procedure suggested by the commission in late August and accepted by both sides. The French have referred to their high command the commission's proposal that the situation should be investigated at once by a joint commission team.

6. Regroupment of forces — a number of Soviet and Norwegian ships are evacuating Viet Minh forces to the north from their concentration areas in the south. The French, suspecting that prisoners of war and internees might be forcibly removed to the north, requested the commission to appoint teams to ensure that only authorized personnel are carried. Teams in Cap St. Jacques and Qui Nhon are now engaged in the task. One of the ships having left Qui Nhon before the arrival of the team, the French requested that the team in Tourane should be instructed to board the ship when it puts into that port. The Polish representative formally stated that if the commission felt that this should be done, he would not object. He pointed out that a serious precedent was involved. DR authorities might suggest that United States ships in Saigon might be inspected and that the French could board and visit any ship which happened to be in a port under their control. The commission agreed with the chairman that if the French so desired, a commission team might observe boarding and visit of Soviet ship in Tourane by French Union officials.

7. You will note that a number of important and potentially controversial problems were cleared up in the course of the meeting. Polish attitude has remained cooperative and objective. Feel that for the immediate future at least good progress can now be made in a number of fields.

WEEKLY REPORT ON VIETNAM COMMISSION
REGROUPMENT OF FORCES THE HANOI AREA

1. Military occupation of the Hanoi perimeter was effected over the weekend without incidents.

2. The Democratic Republic authorities have taken over very efficiently the administration of the city. There is every indication that the move was carefully planned and carried out with remarkable assurance.

3. As usual the Communists had given careful thought to propaganda aspects of the operation — the city was immediately covered with flags and posters. Parades and meetings have been held regularly and elaborate preparations are being made for Ho Chi Minh's arrival.

4. Freedom of movement — Having considered the Franco-Vietnamese proposals the Commission on October 8 confirmed its earlier decision to suggest the setting up of a committee to deal in co-operation with representatives of both parties with the whole problem of movement from one zone to the other. Both sides will meet with the Commission to discuss the problem on October 15 and to indicate what steps they have taken to disseminate information in their zones on the relevant sections of the Geneva Agreement and to assist persons who wish to move.

5. Exchange of prisoners of war — A French Union soldier has escaped from a camp and reported to the fixed team at Lao-Kay that some 400 French Union prisoners are being held in 2 camps near Tuyen Quang. The Commission on October 13 requested immediate comments from the Democratic Republic authorities.

6. On October 14 another escaped prisoner of war turned up at our office with a French liaison officer and requested protection and repatriation for himself and his wife. He was referred to the Commission where he made a statement and was advised to surrender to the Democratic Republic authorities who would be approached for the disposition of his case.

7. The French appealed this decision and urged that the escaped prisoner be turned over to them or held in custody by the Commission. (The story had leaked to the press who were most insistent to talk to the prisoner). The Commission discussed the matter and suggested to both parties that in the future persons claiming to be escaped prisoners of war would be given the opportunity of stating their case and then handed over for safe custody to the local authorities indicated by the liaison mission of the government in control of the territory where the prisoner of war reported to the Commission. The government in question would investigate the case and consider the prisoner as "under trial" and available to the Commission. When the report was received the Commission would either request the liberation of the prisoner or his surrender to the authorities concerned. The Democratic Republic authorities agreed to accept custody of the prisoner. The French and the Democratic Republic liaison missions have referred the general proposal to their High Commands. A full report on this dramatic incident and discussion going forward in next bag.

8. The Indians and the Poles were at first inclined to consider that these prisoners were petitioners and that having stated their case they could not expect the Commission to do more than make the usual enquiry from the authorities concerned. At our insistence, the principle that the local authorities should be responsible not only for investigation but for the "safe custody" of the prisoners pending the disposition of their case was accepted.

9. There is mounting evidence that fairly substantial groups of prisoners of war have not yet been surrendered. The Commission may now request both parties to indicate where they stand in the matter and possibly ask them to give a pledge that by say a certain date all prisoners of war will be returned.

10. Organization — On October 13 it was agreed that in the future when teams are requested by one side or the other, they will be accompanied by liaison officers and interpreters from both sides. When teams are sent by the Commission at its own initiative only interpreters drawn from a panel submitted by both sides will be required.

11. On October 21st a Canadian and a Polish officer will proceed to Saigon and assist Indian officer there in making arrangements to set up the Commission office. The political officers representing each delegation will go later. It was decided on October 14 that they might accompany the Commission on its next visit to Saigon and perhaps remain there if, by then, adequate accommodation and office facilities were available.

12. Teams — On October 14 fixed teams were established at Vinh, Ba Ngoi, Ten Yen and Nha Trang.

13. A mobile team was sent on October 15 to Nam Dinh and Phat Diem area to investigate French claim that large groups of Catholics wish to leave for the South.

14. Teams at Qui Nhon and Cap St. Jacques have observed arrangements made for transportation of Democratic Republic troops from South on Soviet and Norwegian ships and checked that no prisoners of war and civilian internees were involved.

DESPATCH 109

Hanoi, October 19, 1954

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT IN NORTH VIETNAM CATHOLIC POPULATION

In our telegram No. 119 of October 15, we informed you that a Mobile Team had been sent by the Commission to the Nam Dinh and the Phat Diem area, to investigate complaints filed by the French Liaison Mission, to the effect that a large group of Catholics in that area were being prevented from moving to South Vietnam. This team proceeded to Nam Dinh on October 15, consisting of one member from each delegation (Captain Bérubé representing us), and of Madame Ciechanowska, the Deputy Secretary-General in charge of Petitions. In view of its preliminary findings and of the great number of petitions which it received on arrival in Nam Dinh, the Mobile Team decided to return to Hanoi the same day in order to make a first report to the Commission. Two copies of this report are attached for your information.†

2. Although there have been many reports in the course of the last month of Catholics being prevented from proceeding to South Vietnam, it was the first time an official complaint had been submitted on the subject by the French Liaison Mission, and a Mobile Team sent by the Commission to investigate. The preliminary findings of the team are therefore particularly significant.

3. Both from the report of the team and from our conversations with Captain Bérubé, one main feature seems to come out, namely, that the Catholic population, at least in the Nam Dinh area, does not appear any longer especially anxious at this stage to evacuate. After all the publicity and importance originally attached to this problem of evacuation of the Catholic population from the North to the South, this tentative finding by the Mobile Team may appear a little startling. And yet, a close examination of the various possible factors which may at present be bearing on this group of the population in the Nam Dinh area seems to be able to provide some reasonable explanations for this apparent change of attitude. The team has now been requested by the Commission to return to Nam Dinh for a few more days in order to complete its investigation, and to attempt to clarify some of the contradictory evidence which it had gathered on its first visit. If the second report of the team confirms in general its provisional findings, then a completely new light will have been thrown on this problem of evacuation to South Vietnam, and the French authorities may very well find it desirable to ease up the attention which they have been trying to muster on the problem.

4. In fact, in an informal conversation today with members of the French Liaison Mission, we have been given to understand that the French authorities have already begun to think of re-assessing their policies on this matter, partly, as already suggested, because of the possibility that their efforts may meet with little success, and partly by the fear of Viet Minh retaliation in the form of agitation among the refugee groups which have reached South Vietnam. The French authorities were probably too pressed at the outset to give proper consideration to all the implications of their policies regarding movements of population from the North to the South, and their early policies on the matter may now be proving less wise on a long-term basis than originally anticipated. We also gather that the French authorities are becoming more attentive to the potential advantages of having some Catholic strong-holds in North Vietnam at the time when the Vietnamese people are called to the polls in July, 1956. The evacuation from the North of all sympathetic and likely democratic elements might indeed mean a solid Viet Minh vote in at least half of the country, which, added to the greater population of North Vietnam and to the gains which it would surely make here and there in the South, could very well result in a House of Representatives hopelessly under Viet Minh control.

5. For our part, we are for the present inclined to believe, unless some new and conclusive evidence comes to the fore, that the Team's preliminary report probably gives a fairly accurate picture of the state of mind of the Catholic population in the Nam Dinh area, if not in other similar places. We can indeed think of three important factors which may have genuinely influenced the Catholic population in the area to decide to stay where it is:

(a) It would seem from most reports that the Catholic population in North Vietnam has been enjoying so far a generally wide freedom to practice their religion. While we have the right to assume this policy might not be followed indefinitely, there is a fair chance that the Viet Minh authorities will not disturb the pattern of village life and of the religious activities which go with it as long as there is a chance that the Commission might make investigations and that any pressure against the Catholics might mean less unanimity in the general elections. The basic reason for the Catholics to ask for evacuation to South Vietnam is, therefore, for the time being hardly existent;

(b) It is often said that the Oriental mind tends to look at things with a very long-range view and that the villager is above all influenced by his deep attachment to his land and village. Many of the petitions collected in Nam Dinh by the Team made reference to the harsh conditions under which they were called upon to live during the war under "French occupation"; granted that many of these petitions may have been submitted at the instigation of the local authorities and that many of the bad conditions which existed before may have been more the result of war rather than the result of the French presence, one may venture to think that the population in general, whether Catholic or not, may consider the present conditions as an improvement and as adequate assurance that they will be able to remain at their ancestral homes without any undue change in their daily life. The Tonkinese in particular have been so often overrun by various races and types of government throughout their long history, that they probably feel that they can now manage to get along under the new régime with no more difficulties than in the past;

(c) News from some of the persons who were evacuated to the South has now begun to filter back to their village of origin; while some organs of the South Vietnamese Government have made a sincere effort to have refugees from the North re-settled as comfortably and as quickly as possible, hundreds of them are still lingering in refugee camps where most deplorable living conditions exist. It is certain that some of the reports from these refugee camps are no enticement for other Catholics to leave everything which they cherish, and to move to a new land of many unknowns, and possibly of many sufferings and hardships before they can be properly looked after by the Government of South Vietnam. The members of the French Liaison Mission themselves have confided in us that the South Vietnamese Government has failed in many ways to cope with the refugee problem and that in the present circumstances many of the persons who were evacuated would gladly return to their old village if given the opportunity.

6. Apart from these three important factors which, we should assume, must not have been without affecting the people's attitude on this subject of evacuation, it is also conceivable that the Viet Minh authorities themselves took a few steps in order to be even more certain of the result of the investigation by the Mobile Team:

(a) There was a delay of several days between the time when the Commission decided to send a team, and the team's arrival in Nam Dinh; there was, therefore, no element of surprise in the visit and the Viet Minh authorities had ample time to ensure that the local residents were properly "informed" and "briefed";

(b) Assuming that there had been community leaders who may have had the courage to speak up — but there has been so far no evidence to that effect — the Viet Minh authorities would have had plenty of time to remove or neutralise these persons;

(c) Judging, for instance, by the performance of the Viet Minh in Hanoi since the take-over, in organizing their services and in getting the wheels of propaganda efficiently in operation only a few hours after their arrival, there can be little doubt that the Viet Minh could have also organized the people of Nam Dinh in such a way as to have put on a convincing show. This may have been done in several ways — either through threats of violence or reprisal, or a large sprinkling of Vietnamese soldiers and police in the various crowds which beset the team during its visit, merely through the training which they had already successfully instilled in the peoples of that region.

7. Since there are for the moment few reasons to believe that the situation presented by the above considerations is likely to vary much from one area to another in North Vietnam, there would seem to be little that the Commission, or for that matter, our delegation could do to alter this state of affairs. It is certainly not the task of the Commission, nor of any of its members individually, to assign to itself the task of ferreting out those persons who may have at one time or another wanted to be evacuated, but who now, by reason of one or more of the factors outlined above, have decided to remain where they are. This may mean, at best, that the Commission must be content with keeping a close watch on all those regions the populations of which, because of their political or religious sympathies, are more likely to be subjected to whatever pressure the Viet Minh may consider necessary to consolidate their position, and to achieve the unification of North Vietnam. In other words, having failed to establish in concrete terms that obstacles are being placed in the way of those people who may still want to go to South Vietnam, it would seem that the Commission can only attempt, by the means at its disposal, to ensure that for the people who stay behind there remains at least freedom of movement, in case they wish to use it, and that their democratic rights are safeguarded.

8. This is a task which may have to be done for some time by mobile teams, as the present mobile team will be doing in the Nam Dinh area during the next two or three days, but which may later on be taken over by the fixed teams as they become established, and as they are empowered to travel freely everywhere within their respective areas.

9. From the delegation's point of view, this will also mean that we will have to continue to brief very carefully the Canadian members of the teams on what exactly is expected of the Commission in the field of freedom of movement. The proposed Committee on Freedoms should prove of considerable assistance in directing the teams' activities in this connection. In some places, for instance, and particularly in the North, the villagers may have been told what they should say to team members, and it is only after they have recited their set speeches that the members of teams might be able to get anywhere in their search for the truth.

10. We shall not fail to let you know if the second report from this mobile team reveals any new evidence which necessitates re-evaluation of the situation and of the related problems to which we have referred above.

Hanoi, October 19, 1954

Reference: Our Despatch No. 109 of Oct. 19.

THE INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION AND THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE GENEVA AGREEMENT

We have already discussed in another communication some of the immediate and practical implications of the quick investigation undertaken by a mobile team of the International Commission in an area under the control of the Democratic Republic, where the French suspected that there might be a large Catholic population wishing to be moved to the South. The failure of the team to produce any evidence of the kind which might have been expected raised also wider problems concerning the future of the Commission and our own position in relation thereto.

2. The Commission is faced with the task of supervising and controlling the implementation of the Geneva Agreement by two very different parties. On one side, there is a dictatorial, totalitarian and ruthlessly efficient régime; on the other, authority is divided between the French and the Vietnamese Government and to some extent democratic freedoms are allowed. As a result, it is easy to foresee that all the principles and procedures which are now being developed by the Commission to assist both parties in carrying out the terms of the Agreement concerning the exchange of prisoners, freedom of movement, democratic rights, will often work to the advantage of the Democratic Republic régime.

3. It is now clear that both sides are still holding prisoners of war. In a few months, the French Union forces will find it very difficult to get accurate and recent information as to the location of D.R. camps. The D.R. authorities, for their part, with their sympathisers in the South, will not experience the same handicap. Requests for investigation will come from the D.R. authorities and it is only too likely that the results will not be favourable to the French Union.

4. Similarly, given the nature of the two régimes, I doubt whether many people will complain in the North concerning the lack of democratic freedom; in the South, if the D.R. authorities so desire, the office of the Commission in Saigon will be swamped with petitions and complaints. I am not suggesting that the National Vietnamese Government will be worse than the Democratic Republic, but in checking up whether both parties are carrying out their obligations under the Geneva

Agreement, the activities of the Commission are more likely to result in embarrassment for the South.

5. Given the outcome of the Nam Dinh experiment, I am less and less optimistic as to the prospects of being able to move quickly enough to surprise the D.R. authorities and to induce them to release many prisoners of war or to allow many Catholics to move South. And I am afraid that any results which may be achieved in the South will just assist the D.R. authorities in their propaganda and in their struggle for seizing power in that area also later on.

6. Such being the situation, the French may reach the conclusion that the activities of the Commission will complicate their task in the South. Probably, until the regroupment of forces has been completed, they will continue to require the assistance of the Commission to solve any difficulties which may arise, and their attitude may not change for a while. After the 300 days have elapsed they may become less and less inclined to co-operate. I am also concerned that they, as well as large bodies of the public in other countries, may feel that as members of the Commission we have condoned in the North a situation which is really intolerable while, at the same time, we have become involved in operations in the South which have been exploited by the Communists for their own purposes.

7. When we come to think in terms of elections, the same problems arise necessarily: the Communists, under the terms of the Geneva Agreement, will be able to carry on their activities in the South and they will be in a position to appeal to the Commission if there is any interference. At the same time, I cannot imagine that the Vietnamese National authorities — weak, inexperienced as they are — will be able to organize anything worthwhile in the North. And even if they tried, it would be almost impossible for them to establish the fact that they did not enjoy the same facilities in the North as the Communists in the South.

8. Perhaps we are too pessimistic and the picture we have just sketched is too dark. It may be that the D.R. authorities will not press their advantage and that they will take a conciliatory attitude, leaving open such possibilities, for instance, as the setting-up of a coalition government for the whole country. But there is also the other possibility that, as they have done so far, they will pursue vigorously their objective of extending their control to the whole country. Were this to happen, I foresee that our own position may become increasingly more difficult and somewhat embarrassing. The sad fact is that having lost their war against the Viet Minh, the French have in effect surrendered the population in the North, including the Catholics and perhaps many prisoners; and they are still faced with the problem of Communist infiltration in the South. What they have been unable to obtain by force of arms they cannot expect the Commission — and even less the Canadian Delegate — to achieve. The French may discover that for the type of dinner they have arranged in Geneva, their spoon is not long enough.

9. As long as the Democratic Republic do not violate the terms of the Agreement or it cannot be proven that they do, we will have to accept the inevitable consequences of the French defeat. The Commission cannot attempt to compel a Communist régime to be democratic or to assist the French to cut their losses in the North or to resist Communist penetration in the South.

10. This does not mean that, on the whole, the Commission may not yet have a useful task to perform. A substantial number of prisoners of war have been exchanged; through pressure on both sides rather than through investigations by mobile teams, the Commission may encourage further exchanges on a quid pro quo basis; the regroupment of forces will be an important accomplishment and the Commission has an important role to play in this respect. And what is more significant, as long as both parties can negotiate, if necessary through the Commission, there is less danger of a new outbreak of hostilities. These, I would consider to be the main achievements to be hoped for: whether all persons who wish to move to another zone will be able to do so, whether democratic freedoms will really be enjoyed in both zones and whether all prisoners of war will be released is more uncertain but, considering the overall picture, perhaps of lesser importance. The ideal would be, of course, to achieve all objectives but failure to achieve fully those which are of secondary importance should not be allowed to obscure the fact that the main provisions of the Agreement are likely to be carried out.

WEEKLY REPORT ON VIETNAM COMMISSION

In view of delays involved in transmission of long messages to Saigon and New Delhi we now propose for the time being to send our weekly report to New Delhi through courier leaving Hanoi on Wednesdays. This report covers period October 16 to 26, but following reports will be prepared at weekly intervals.

2. Regroupment of forces. On October 21 and 25 the Commission met with the liaison officers from both sides and requested additional information to deal with the problem of the area to be surrendered by the Democratic Republic authorities as the second instalment in the central sector at the end of the 100 day period.

3. At the meeting on October 26 it transpired that both parties were discussing in the Joint Commission an alternative French proposal (that?) at the end of 100 day period Democratic Republic will surrender area they suggested, but they would surrender area claimed by the French at the end of the 200 day period. Prospects of agreed arrangement which is in line with Indian and Canadian views seem good.

4. Freedom of movement. At the meeting of October 15 the French Liaison Mission naturally accepted the Commission's slightly modified version of their own proposal for a Committee to deal with the problem as a whole. The Democratic Republic suggested instead a sub-Committee of the Joint Commission, arguing that the parties themselves were responsible for the implementation of the agreement and that the Commission could not cope with the large number of cases involved. The Chairman insisted that the proposed Committee would merely supplement the action of both parties, supervise their operations and arbitrate any differences which might arise. The Democratic Republic representative agreed to consult his authorities and to discuss the matter again on Monday October 18. In the end it was agreed that both the Joint Commission and the International Commission would set up committees to work in close liaison, primary responsibility would rest with the Joint Commission body but the other could take the initiative of making general recommendations or of sending mobile teams to investigate particular incidents. The 2 committees will be concerned with freedom of movement and democratic freedoms generally.

5. Prisoners of war. (Reference paragraphs 7 and 8 of our telegram No. 119 of October 15.) The Democratic Republic authorities after investigation reported that the young man in question was a deserter from French Union forces, he had never been arrested by the Democratic Republic authorities but pretended to the French that he had escaped from a P/W camp to avoid court martial and to be evacuated to the south; he had now changed his mind and wished to remain in the north.

6. The Chairman and the Polish Commissioner felt that the young man should be released. We argued that if he had been a P/W he would have been returned to the French, if he had been guilty of a criminal offence he would have been left to the Democratic Republic authorities, his case now appeared to be that of a civilian making a choice as to his zone of residence. There was conflicting evidence concerning his intentions and we suggested that he might appear before a mobile team of the Commission at the Haiduong perimeter to be given an opportunity of expressing his wishes under conditions which left no possible doubt as to his complete freedom. To meet our point the Chairman proposed that the young man should be interviewed by the Committee on Freedoms in Hanoi.

7. We were not completely satisfied that no pressure was applied to obtain a statement favourable to the Democratic Republic but we had to assume that the Democratic Republic authorities would act in good faith and place no obstacles in his way if the young man decided to go south later. We accepted, therefore the above compromise arrangement.

8. Teams. (Reference paragraph 13 of our telegram No. 119 of October 15.) The mobile team reported that during its short stay in Nam Dinh conflicting evidence was submitted. The Commission decided that a more thorough investigation should be undertaken. At the suggestion of Polish representative it was agreed that the team should also enquire whether pressure was exercised to induce people to go south etc. Polish Deputy Secretary General who accompanies the team has done her best to postpone this second trip (which is now scheduled for October 28) and had suggested one sided instructions which have now been revised and are more balanced and objective. There are disturbing indications that Polish delegation and Democratic Republic authorities will cooperate so that teams do not find any damaging evidence but gather material which may serve Democratic Republic propaganda purposes.

9. The operations sub-committee has still not been able to issue instructions to the fixed teams on their radius of action. The Canadian proposal has been agreed to with a few minor exceptions by the Indian member but the Poles have neither agreed nor forwarded a counter proposition. The Canadian and Indian members have been trying without success to induce the Polish member to agree to their joint proposal, state his objections to it with a view to a compromise, or to bring forward a Polish proposition for discussion. It is the opinion of the Canadian members that the Poles are purposely delaying the issue of the instructions to prevent the fixed teams from being allowed to move around the country at will. Remarks made by the Indian members indicate that they agree with the Canadian opinion.

10. The Polish member of the operations sub-committee did his best to prevent the Commission from carrying out a road reconnaissance from Hanoi to Lang Song. He was overruled by the Chairman and the reconnaissance party will leave Hanoi on 28 October.

11. A mobile team was sent to North Quang Gnai to observe the takeover of the northern portion of the province from the DPR by French Union forces. They report that the French Union forces are not expected to arrive in Quang Gnai until 31 October.

12. The Polish ship Kilinski, reported to be carrying 3000 troops and 100 tons of arms, left Qui Nhon on 23 October bound for Gua Hoi and Samson.

13. The Tourane fixed team are still investigating the Ain Ghia incident and expect to submit their report by 30 October.

14. General. Blair Fraser arrived Hanoi October 22 and left 26. We arranged entry and exit visas, accommodation and interviews with commissioners, chiefs of liaison missions and other officials.

WEEKLY PROGRESS REPORT FOR VIETNAM

1. It would seem that my arrival in Hanoi has coincided with the discussion in the Commission of a number of delicate problems and of several other items. The organizational stage is now apparently over and many of our present problems bring up questions of principle intimately related to the basic spirit of the Geneva Agreement.

2. Mobility of fixed teams. The question of the fixed teams mobility, which the Operations Committee has in vain tried to solve for over 10 days, was referred back to the Commission for reviewing in the light of a communication from the Democratic Republic liaison mission in which the Democratic Republic indicated its non-acceptance of the principle of complete freedom of movement for fixed teams within their respective zones of action. Although, as we have reported to you in our telegram No. 115 of October 13, paragraph 4, the Commission was considered to have agreed unanimously that mobility of fixed teams within their zones of action was essential for effective supervision as provided in the agreement, the Polish representative took the line that the agreement meant the fixed teams must be 'fixed' at their respective locations as designated in the agreement and could become mobile outside the scope proposed in Article 36 only for special assignments and upon decision by the Commission.

3. I submitted that a distinction must be drawn between duties of supervision and duties of control. The chairman appeared to agree that such distinction was of importance. The chairman and I argued that the Commission could properly discharge its responsibilities, particularly that relating to supervision, only if its fixed teams were free to travel throughout their given zones. The Polish delegate suggested that the previous decision of the Commission had been intended to facilitate within the Commission the administration and use of fixed teams, but did not cover the question of zones of action for fixed teams. He also attempted to prove, in my view not too convincingly as far as the chairman was concerned, that supervision was for all practical purposes almost synonymous with control and did not justify the thesis that fixed teams should be allowed to 'roam and the country at will and indiscriminately'.

4. I think that we all recognize that this is one of the most important problems to be settled by the Commission, and that a decision on it may very well either assure the success of the Commission's task or impair seriously an honest implementation of the Geneva Agreement. In the face of the obvious deadlock during the last discussion of this question the chairman decided to ask the delegations to have further thought to the matter, for subsequent discussion at today's meeting, November 5.

5. Prisoners of War. On November 1, having received a report from the fixed team at Que Nhon that prisoners of war were alleged to be held by both French Union and Democratic Republic forces, the Commission requested both parties to investigate and report quickly. The Commission agreed that in the absence of satisfactory replies, both parties should be requested to send a joint team to carry out the necessary enquiries on the ground.

6. As to the general problem of exchange of prisoners of war and internees, news of further recent exchanges between the 2 sides has made the Commission realize that both parties still held prisoners of war and that they are still negotiating exchanges. In the circumstances the Commission agreed that the chairman should make another informal approach, urging both parties to expedite a final agreement and giving notice that more formal action might soon be necessary by the Commission to ensure compliance with the provisions of Article 21.

7. Regroupment of forces — supervision by Commission teams on November 2, as a result of petitions received from the Haiphong area, the Commission agreed that on the basis of the experience gained in dealing with disputes relating to the orderly transfer of public services general instructions might be sent to fixed teams located in areas surrendered by one party to the other. These teams would thus find it easier to deal with any problem which might arise during the change-over. The instructions would specify that teams should only be concerned with alleged violation of the agreement. Instructions will have to be approved by the Commission.

8. Freedom of movement. The mobile team envisaged for Phat Diem left Hanoi as agreed on November 2. At the Monday meeting the chairman, Mr. Desai who had returned from Saigon merely raised the question of instructions to the team. These were agreed upon without difficulty. The team, in its first telegraphic message dated November 3 has reported to the Commission that it has fairly reliable information that there may be as many as 10,000 people desiring to go south from the Phat Diem area. Attempts at interference with fixed teams investigation had been reported, and the chairman has requested the Democratic Republic liaison mission to send immediate instructions for adequate assistance to the mobile team to carry out its investigation unhindered by popular demonstrations or interference. If the figures mentioned by the mobile team are correct, this brings up a problem of evacuation which the Democratic Republic alone might not be able to handle and which may require the intervention of the Commission for assistance from the French Union in the form of ships and other transport facilities.

9. Besides its request for a mobile team to go to Poulo Condore, the Polish delegation sponsored also on November 2, a request by the Democratic Republic authorities to have a mobile team investigate an incident reported to have taken place on October 25, at Cho Ben 180 kilometers southwest of Saigon. The 2 liaison missions have been asked by the Committee on Freedoms to supply as much information as possible both about the situation at Poulo Condore and at Cho Ben. The Committee on Freedoms has been asked to report to the Commission today on these 2 requests. The Commission has already agreed to principle to send a mobile team to Poulo Condore, and it may be expected that a similar decision will be reached for Cho Ben. In line with our attitude so far regarding the use of teams, and in spite of the Polish attitude regarding the sending of teams to North Vietnam, I consider it unwise to deny requests for mobile teams from either side, provided the request is clearly not frivolous and that there is a reasonable minimum of a case.

10. Resistance of armed units in North Vietnam. The French liaison mission on November 3, submitted to the Commission a copy of a letter addressed to the Laos Commission from the Commanding Officer of Guerrilla units reported located in Pakha area, east of Lao Kay. Some 7000 men are supposed to be involved. From the communication received it seems that these guerrillas are prepared to lay down their arms but that they are being prevented from doing so by the Democratic Republic authorities who are attempting to destroy them. This might explain the troops reinforcements around Lao Kay recently reported by our fixed team there. The Commission has requested the 2 sides to try to inform these guerrillas that the Commission has now been seized of their case and to report to the Commission at the earliest what action they intend taking to assist these people.

11. Teams. A reconnaissance-maintenance team to Lang Son was prevented by the Democratic Republic authorities from returning by an alternate road. The attitude of the Polish members would tend to indicate collusion with the Democratic Republic in an attempt to keep the Commission's team off this particular road.

12. The mobile teams sent to Quong Gnai to observe the induction of Central Vietnam provisional assembly area and to Hai Duong to supervise the hand over, completed their assignments successfully with no unusual incident to report.

13. The Operations Sub-Committee has formulated a number of recommendations for decrease in number of maintenance trips to fixed teams and in number of maintenance cases by air. The ability of the Operations Sub-Committee to draft satisfactory instructions for fixed teams and to divide Vietnam into 14 zones of action now rests on outcome of the main discussion in the Commission on the principle of complete freedom of movement of fixed teams.

14. General. In line with its decision to publicize its activities as much as possible the Commission agreed this week on 2 more press releases regarding the establishment of the Committee on Freedoms and the procedure agreed for withdrawals and transfers in the regrouping areas in the presence of Commission teams.

Hanoi, November 10, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference: Our telegram No. 115 of October 13 (para. 4).

ZONES OF ACTION FOR FIXED TEAMS

When we reported in our telegram under reference that the Polish Representative had agreed to the principle of unrestricted freedom of movement for the fixed teams, we thought that an important decision had been made and that it would be comparatively easy to draw up for the fixed teams zones of action which would cover the whole territory of Viet Nam, in such a way that the teams would be free to undertake continuous control and supervision.

2. Soon, however, there were indications in the Operations Committee that there might be difficulties; the Polish Representative raised objections to the delimitation of zones of action for fixed teams as he felt that this could only be done after information was available whether certain points could be covered more readily by one fixed team rather than another. As the local authorities could not or would not allow the teams to circulate until they had received instructions and as instructions could not be drafted and issued before agreement was reached on the zones of action for fixed teams, it soon appeared that an impasse had been reached from a procedural standpoint.

3. In the meantime, the original decision of the Commission had been communicated by the Chairman to both parties. The French Union readily agreed to the Commission's proposals but the D.R. authorities raised a number of legal objections; they agreed that mobile teams could be drawn from the fixed teams but, these mobile teams, outside the zones of action specified for these teams in Article 35, could only move by agreement with the Command of the party concerned. Another impasse had been reached and the matter obviously had to be reconsidered by the Commission.

4. The Polish Ambassador took the line that while fixed teams could become mobile on occasion, it could not be argued that under the Agreement they would be able or free to undertake day-to-day supervision in the whole country. The Agreement foresaw two kinds of teams: fixed and mobile. Fixed teams could only be at fixed points. The D.R. authorities were prepared to agree that, on occasion, these teams might become mobile but then they were subject to the limitations defined in the Agreement as to the operations of mobile teams.

5. The Chairman and I had basically the same position. From a practical point of view, we felt that the Commission could not carry out its tasks of supervision and control unless its teams were allowed to circulate freely. If teams could move only after the agreement of the party concerned had been obtained, this meant that, in effect, teams would only be sent to investigate incidents which had already occurred; this implied a passive and limited role for the Commission. Furthermore, under Article 37, the Commission was given responsibility for control and supervision and this could only be undertaken by its teams, fixed and mobile, to ensure compliance with the terms of the Agreement throughout the whole country. As the Polish Ambassador would not agree, after some three hours of repetitious argumentation, consideration of the item was postponed to the next meeting on Friday November 5.

6. At the following meeting, the Polish Representative took the initiative of suggesting that the matter could be discussed on the next day (Saturday November 6) at an informal meeting of the three Commissioners.

7. Mr. Desai said the question resolved itself into three parts: (a) the legal aspect; (b) the practical aspect; (c) the possibility of having to refer the matter back to the Geneva Powers by way of a request for an amendment to the Agreement, making it clear that the Commission should have the power of complete freedom of movement for the Fixed Teams as well as the Mobile Teams.

8. From the legalistic point of view, he suggested that, if the Commission were questioned as to what supervision it had exercised in the North and South, it would have to admit that it had full powers but unless such powers were exercised over the complete territory by the Fixed Teams, it would not be in a position to say that the Commission had properly exercised the supervisory responsibility placed upon it by Article 36.

9. From the practical point of view, he considered the territory could not be completely covered by Mobile Teams unless we created 14 new mobile teams. It seemed, therefore, necessary that the Fixed Teams should have complete freedom of movement for the purpose of observation, inspection, investigation and control throughout 14 designated territories, which territories would in toto cover the whole area required to be under supervision.

10. Thirdly, from the psychological point of view, he considered that, if the teams were fixed with no power of movement, observation, or inspection, their morale would soon deteriorate as they would realize their function was nominal and they were not effectively supervising their respective areas. Also the prestige of the teams and of the Commission would be lowered and in time the Fixed Teams would feel that their function as Fixed Teams was nothing but a farce.

11. The Polish Ambassador said that he could not agree that the Fixed Teams should have powers of inspection or observation as the Mobile Teams have. He referred to Article 35 and argued that the function of the Fixed Teams was set and they were territorially fixed. The zones of action of the Mobile Teams were also set, as to where they could go with complete freedom of movement, and the final sentence of Article 35 clearly showed that beyond the zones of action as defined, the Mobile Teams could carry out their movements within the limits of the tasks given them by the Agreement, only by agreement with the command of the party concerned. He pointed out that the parties had already been very cooperative in allowing the Mobile Teams freedom of movement to any place or in any territory ordered by the Commission itself. He quoted a French proverb to the effect that "rather than seek something better, it is necessary to hold what is good". He felt that we must retain the cooperation of the parties in allowing our Mobile Teams complete freedom of movement, but he thought the parties would object, and could quite properly object, under the terms of Article 35, if the Commission attempted to give complete freedom of movement, even within certain territorial boundaries, to the Fixed Teams.

12. He argued that under the terms of Article 35, the Commission should not give complete liberty of movement to the Fixed Teams but that any task outside their areas as designated by the Geneva Agreement should be given by the Commission itself, after consultation with the liaison missions so that the liaison missions would know where the teams wished to operate and could make the necessary arrangements for their entry. He pointed out that the areas of control of liaison officers do not coincide with the proposed territories to be allotted to the Fixed Teams.

13. I pointed out the difference between supervision and control as it appears from Article 36. The Chairman agreed with me that the Commission itself was responsible for supervision under Article 36, and that, for the purpose of supervising, the specific tasks of control, observation, inspection and investigation, it should use its teams. I pointed out, and the Chairman seemed to agree, that Article 38 clearly indicated that the inspection teams were to exercise powers of supervision to investigate, control, and inspect, and submit to the Commission itself the results of their supervision, investigation, and observations. The Polish Ambassador pointed out that the word "Supervision" in the English text of Article 38 was an error, and the official French version shows this to be the case, as the word used in it is "contrôle".

14. I pointed out that if the tasks of observation, inspection and investigation were not exercised by the Fixed Teams, they would have to be exercised either by the Commission itself, which would be impracticable, or by a series of Mobile Teams to a number which would be impossible to organize with existing personnel, particularly when there are so many special incidents to be investigated by the Mobile Teams. If the tasks of inspection, control or investigation, and particularly observation, could not be exercised by the Fixed Teams, the work of supervision would be impossible to perform, and the Commission would have to admit that from the practical and the legal point of view there was no real supervision.

15. Also, from the practical point of view, I asked how else than by free movement of the Fixed Teams throughout their allotted territory could the task of control, observation, inspection and investigation be carried out. I also pointed out that Article 38 referred to "the inspection teams" which included both the Mobile and Fixed Teams.

16. I also pointed out the value from a practical point of view and the deterring effect of having the Fixed Teams move through their respective areas so that the people would know they were present. As to the Pole's suggestion that the Fixed Teams were intended to be the same as the Fixed Teams in Korea, I pointed out that in Korea the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission was subordinate to the Military Armistice Commission. It had been given the specific task of supervising the rotation of military personnel, replacement, etc. Under the Geneva Agreement, the Joint Commission was subordinate to the International Commission and it was the International Commission which had been charged under Article 36 with the responsibility for supervision and the fixed and mobile teams were given to it. It was therefore essential that the teams, both Fixed and Mobile, should be in a position to perform the specific task necessary in order to ensure supervision in accordance with Article 36.

17. After further considerable discussion, it seemed to be agreed between all parties that the Fixed Teams must at least be in a position to observe, as part of their duties.

18. The Polish Ambassador again argued Article 35 and stated that at Geneva both parties had reserved their rights as to the freedom of movement of the inspection teams. At first, the French at Geneva had wished to give the teams full freedom of movement and inspection as if the Commission were a "super-governmental body". When it looked as if they might not arrive at an agreement at all, Article 35 was redrafted and certain other provisions were eliminated. The result was that the final sentence was put into Article 35 whereby both parties reserved their right to have the teams inspect in areas other than those specifically designated, only by agreement with the command of the party concerned.

19. Mr. Desai said that he, while in London, had looked up the daily despatches from the Geneva Conference and found that there had been during the discussions, reservations by both parties as to the free movement of the teams and that the clauses regarding the degree of inspection had been varied from time to time. The final clauses were not drawn until after it had been decided what three nations were to be asked to constitute the International Commission. He agreed it was quite possible that Article 35 could have been redrawn and other provisions in the draft eliminated once it was found that India, Canada and Poland were to constitute the Commission.

20. I then suggested that as all seemed to be agreed that the Fixed Teams should have the right of "observation" and as the Polish Ambassador seemed to think that there was some question of obtaining the cooperation of the parties, there might be some virtue in the Chairman approaching the parties informally with a view to obtaining their reaction to a suggestion that the Commission felt the Fixed Teams should have freedom of movement on their own initiative throughout territorial areas respectively designated to them by the Commission, for purposes of observation. This suggestion was discussed and the Chairman thought it would be in order for him to approach the parties along the above lines in his capacity as Secretary General.

21. We discussed the implications of this suggestion and the Polish Ambassador indicated that he was in favour of trying it, as did the Chairman. I stated that I had not discussed this proposal with my advisers but would do so and let the Chairman know. It was agreed that the Chairman would not approach the parties until he had word from me that the Canadian Delegation considered it in order to do so. It was suggested that fixed teams might be broken down into a fixed element which would remain at its fixed point and a mobile element which would move through its territory to observe.

22. During the afternoon I had a discussion with my advisers on the above question and it was agreed that I should tell Mr. Desai that we were in favour of him approaching the parties informally as Secretary General and see what their reactions would be to a proposal from the Commission that Fixed Teams should have freedom to move on their own initiative throughout the respective territorial areas to be designated by the Commission for the purpose of observation, and without prejudice to their right to exercise their other tasks of control, inspection and investigation, as may be assigned to them by the Commission. It is to be understood that "observation" shall include the establishment of liaison with the local authorities.

23. At the meeting on Monday November 8, the Chairman reported for the record the agreement reached between the three Commissioners as to the action he was to take as Secretary General in approaching the two parties informally with the above suggestion.

24. I well realize the danger that the D.R. authorities may yet refuse to accept this compromise proposal or, if they accept it that they may take it as tantamount to an acceptance by the Commission of their view that for purposes other than observation, fixed teams will only be allowed to move with their agreement in each particular case. On the other hand, I felt that as long as it was clearly specified that our proposal was without prejudice to other steps which might be considered later, there was some virtue in a gradual approach; if teams were tactful in the initial stages and did not give the impression that they intended to concern themselves with all that the D.R. authorities were doing, whether in fields related to the Agreement or not, their suspicions might be allayed to some extent. Furthermore, if agreement could be reached on freedom for the teams for purposes of observation, the Commission might be in a position to satisfy itself that it was, as far as practicable, controlling and supervising compliance with the Agreement in respect, for instance, of the movement of military personnel and supplies. Mere observations would not, admittedly, be as effective concerning the problem of freedoms but I was concerned as was the Chairman, that if we pressed on this point there was little hope of making any progress now or later, without perhaps a long and complicated reference of the whole matter to the Geneva Powers. It was better, I felt, to ascertain first whether the D.R. Government were prepared at least to take a few steps in what we consider to be the right direction rather than insist that they go the whole way in the knowledge that they might refuse.

WEEKLY PROGRESS REPORT FOR VIETNAM

1. Mobility of fixed teams. We have covered recent developments in our telegram No. 156 of November 10, 1954.†

2. Regroupment of forces. The French have now reported that the Democratic Republic authorities will not discuss further territorial withdrawals in central Vietnam as part of the second instalment, and they have appealed to the Commission (our telegram No. 135 of October 27, paragraphs 2 and 3). The matter came before the Commission on Thursday, and it has been agreed that the parties will be called before the Commission to discuss it next week.

3. Freedom of movement. A report on the more recent discussions concerning Phat Diem was sent in our telegram No. 154 of November 9.†

4. On Monday the fixed team in Haiphong reported that, according to the French, thousands of refugees wishing to go south were concentrated on a sand island near Phat Diem at the mouth of the Tra-Ly River. During the previous 48 hours, 4200 had been rescued at sea and whole remaining lot might drown due to very high tide expected early on November 9.

5. At a meeting of the Commission with the two liaison missions, the French requested authorization to send planes and ships to bring relief and assist in the evacuation. They suggested that a mobile team should supervise the operation. The Democratic Republic representative required time to consult his high command. At a further meeting at 5 o'clock on the same day he denied urgency of the situation claimed that local authorities could cope with it and that they were responsible. French offer of assistance was turned down.

6. The Commission was prepared to send a mobile team, but in view of order given to Democratic Republic forces to prevent violation of territorial boundaries, French ships or planes could not be used. Commission cars could not be sent either before Democratic Republic authorities had investigated and could determine practicable roads. This could not be completed before 5 pm on the following day. In fact reports became available only late on the ninth and mobile team left on tenth, two days after critical tide.

7. The mobile team returned on November 12 noon. Our member reports that while it took less than 5 hours to come back, the team had not reached its destination by 5 o'clock on November 10 as Democratic Republic guides lost their way on two or three occasions. They arrived at the mouth of the Tra-Ly only on Thursday, November 11, in the morning and were taken by launch along sand bars on both sides of the mouth of the river. There was no evidence that loss of life had occurred. Smaller bar on south side was not inhabited. On the north, the sand bar was much larger and connected with mainland. There seemed to be some population guarded by soldiers. Some people attempted to establish contact with the team but Democratic Republic liaison officers did not allow team to go ashore.

8. The Commission on November 12 discussed the report of the mobile team which went to Nam Dinh late October. No evidence had been found that people were on the move or anxious to go south but nearly 3000 complaints against the French were brought back. We raised two points:

(a) In view of the reports received from our team at Haiphong during the same period that thousands of people claiming to come from the area had been picked up at sea, we thought that before the report could be accepted more information had to be obtained as to the Democratic Republic arrangements for processing requests from people who wished to exercise their right under Article 14(d). After some discussion it was agreed that Democratic Republic authorities should be invited to give further information as to their procedure concerning applicants who wish to go south. The number of people who have been given permission in the whole area (Nam Dinh, Phat Diem, Bui Chu) and assisted to leave during period October 1 to 20 will also be requested. The Commission agreed with us that this material might make it possible to make useful recommendations in case it appeared that Democratic Republic procedure was not sufficiently known or effective;

(b) On the number of petitions we drew attention to the danger that Secretariat facilities might be overwhelmed. It was agreed that the Committee on Freedoms should discuss the matter with the committee to be established by both parties. It was probable that the bulk of the petitions could be turned over to both parties for action but a certain number would have to be processed by the Commission itself. It was agreed that in the latter case the Commission would have to establish its own priorities. We introduced the idea that in order to prevent the development of a petitions contest between the parties even under the proposed arrangement, the Commission later on might have to divide its efforts equally in dealing with petitions from both sides. The Chairman seemed to be interested in the suggestion.

9. Resistance of armed units in North Vietnam (our telegram No. 148 of November 5 paragraph 10). The French Liaison Mission has now suggested that a delegation of these partisans might come to Lao Kay to discuss with the fixed team conditions of surrender which guarantee safety to them and their families and choice of selecting their zone of residence. The Commission has agreed that the two parties should be urged to discuss and settle the matter among themselves. The Polish representative has given notice of his intention, if the parties fail to agree, to suggest that the Commission is not competent to deal with this case. These units were not part of regular French Union forces he claims and the Commission cannot get involved in disputes between the parties and local rebels.

10. Teams. A scheme to service fixed team at Muong Sen from Laos by air has been investigated and found not to be practical. Establishment of this team is still in abeyance.

11. Transfer of territory in central Vietnam near Quang Ngai was observed by mobile team, all went well.

12. General. Mr. Woodsworth arrived on November 5 and left for Laos November 8. His visit coincided with busiest week-end of the Commission.

13. Commission will leave for Saigon on November 18 and return 22nd. Chief purpose of the visit is to establish sub-office and renew contacts with French Union officials.

IMPORTS OF ARMS

1. There is evidence to indicate that the Democratic Republic authorities are taking various steps to restrict the movements of some of our fixed teams to the villages in which they are stationed.

2. In Lang Son the jeeps supplied for use of the fixed team are in an unreliable condition although there are new Russian vehicles in the same area. On our official (group corrupt) we have a record of 8 separate instances of permission to travel being refused in this same area.

3. In Lang Son and other locations the reasons given to teams for travel restrictions include landslides, blown bridges, lack of ferries or general deterioration of roads although teams are not permitted to check these statements.

4. In certain areas the Democratic Republic authorities have insisted on teams arranging with each individual provincial authority for protection against bandits and pirates. When all else fails the Democratic Republic authorities simply forbid the teams to move.

5. A road reconnaissance was finally made of the Phu Lang Thuon-Lang Son road which was found to be in fair condition although reports received from the Democratic Republic a few days previously had stated the road to be impassable. Road reconnaissance party to Lang Son reported many loaded vehicles on the Phu Lang Thuon road and the fixed teams have sighted unreported military vehicles in and around Lang Son.

6. It would also appear that the Democratic Republic are reluctant to have the Commission on the Thai Nguyen road as requests to recce this road as an alternative route to Lang Son have been refused.

7. I consider that these restrictions, if continued, would prevent the Commission from exercising absolute control on the introduction of war material and personnel in violation of Articles 16 and 17 of the Geneva Agreement.

8. I am considering advisability of sounding out the Secretary General informally and conveying to him our concern that the Commission may be criticized for having left too long the Chinese border (as well as key ports in the South) without adequate supervision and that more effective measures should be taken soon to remedy this situation as far as possible.

9. For the purposes of the formal discussion in the Commission, if and when it takes place, any evidence which could be adduced to support a claim that contraventions have taken place would strengthen the case for developing and tightening control through fixed or mobile teams.

10. Indians, for long range policy considerations, may be reluctant to force the issue. The fixed teams, as long as their freedom of movement is restricted, are unlikely to discover anything which will influence the Indians and direct into less theoretical lines the discussion now in progress on the extent to which the agreement allows freedom of movement for teams.

11. I should appreciate receiving your comments by telegram.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT PHAT DIEM

1. The Commission discussed again on Saturday, November 13, the Phat Diem situation.

2. The Committee on Freedoms reported that the problem was serious and that at least 2,000 persons wanted to go south. They had arranged with local authorities for the setting up of a permit office. Some relief was being provided but transport facilities appeared to be inadequate. It was proposed to move about 300 persons a week in 2 or 3 old launches.

3. We urged that Democratic Republic Government be asked by the Commission to assist local authorities by providing road transport, as recommended by the Committee on Freedoms, to expedite the evacuation. The Chairman was of the opinion that as the Democratic Republic authorities had limited facilities at their disposal but had shown willingness to deal with the problem in setting up a special procedure and office and in providing relief and transport, the Commission for the present should only observe how arrangements made so far would work out. Another team might be sent to the point of delivery at the Haiphong perimeter. He was not prepared at this stage to agree to a recommendation being made to the Democratic Republic Government that faster and more energetic action might be attempted. He was not inclined even to make informal representations.

4. The Pole takes the view that people have assembled at Phat Diem as a result of French Union propaganda and that they have not applied for permission from the local authorities to go south. The Democratic Republic Government have compromised in agreeing to a special procedure and in providing free transportation. He was successful in persuading the Chairman that further pressure on the part of the Commission would not achieve practical results but might impair Democratic Republic cooperation (such as it is).

5. Under the circumstances, we agreed that another mobile team should be sent to delivery point on the Haiphong perimeter and that for the next few days the Commission should observe the progress being made on the basis of reports from the mobile teams (Canadian member of the teams reports that refugees at Phat Diem are scared). We fear that Democratic Republic authorities may be devising schemes to reduce the number of those who will leave.

6. If, as we anticipate, movement is slow and inadequate when the matter is discussed again, I propose to take the line that in dealing with problems in such a reluctant and limited fashion Democratic Republic authorities are creating conditions where cooperation between both parties in the implementation of the agreement may be compromised.

7. Local United States Consul on instructions from State Department has enquired as to the position. In accordance with established procedure, we have suggested that approach should be made in Ottawa. As the enquiry may have been prompted by interest in the U.S. Congress we suggest that if there was to be any disclosure of confidential material we might be embarrassed in our relations with the Indians and Poles in view of the understanding that the Commission itself and not the Commissioners individually should issue statements to the press. It should, however, be taken into account that, due to Democratic Republic Government policy and to the attitude of the Indians and Poles concerning press relations, the press has not been in a position to be adequately informed on the work of the Commission. We have reported in despatches, which were sent to you in diplomatic bag which left here November 13, the difficulties encountered in attempting to safeguard the principles of freedom of the press.

VIET NAM: MOVEMENT OF REFUGEES FROM THE NORTH

Young, the Director of the State Department's Office of South East Asian Affairs, asked us to see him again today, November 17 to talk of the refugee situation in Viet Nam. We took the opportunity of mentioning some of your highly tentative thinking on the matter.

2. We stressed your view that since under the terms of the ceasefire agreement, e.g. Article 14(d), we had to rely on the willingness of the Viet Minh to assist in the evacuation of would-be refugees, it would not make sense to complicate the task by thumping the table. The co-operation of the Viet Minh authorities was essential and however limited it was at the moment we had to remember that it could be non-existent if our tactics were not sound. We said that you did not believe that private organizations interested in the plight of those individuals who wished to go to South Viet Nam should be discouraged from making appeals to the International Commission or to the other parties immediately concerned. We also mentioned the possibility that some civilian agency such as the Red Cross might be able to offer its services in assisting the evacuation from the north in a manner which would meet Viet Minh susceptibilities.

3. Young said he was encouraged to find that the very tentative thinking in both Ottawa and Washington was running along the same lines. It had occurred to the State Department that the Viet Minh might be willing to allow transport to enter the territory which it controlled if that transport were under the direction of some civilian (and neutral) agency. Most of the worldwide charitable agencies, including the Red Cross, were represented in Saigon. Possibly they might make a joint appeal to the Commission and to the Viet Minh and at the same time offer their services in general terms. Young said that the State Department fully appreciated your view that undue public pressure on the Viet Minh might only make the situation worse. He said that the Voice of America would be reporting the situation factually and would deal only with actual incidents which had news value. He could give us no assurance that some prominent Congressman would not issue inflammatory statements but he said that such statement would certainly not be encouraged by the State Department.

4. Young showed us a report which had just come in from the United States Embassy in Saigon which, among other things, quoted Cerles, General Ely's liaison officer to the Commission, to the effect that up to 50,000 refugees, most of them Catholics, might be involved in the present problem. Cerles indicated also that the French Government was putting its views on the matter to the Indian Government in New Delhi. The United States Ambassador believed that the French forces had adequate transportation to move the refugees and were doing all they could within the limits set by the Viet Minh to assist refugees. He commented in addition that the would-be refugees had the complete sympathy of the Southern Vietnamese and the French. His references to the efforts of the Canadian representatives were complimentary in every instance.

5. Young said the State Department would continue to be extremely interested in any reports from the field on the situation which you might be willing to transmit.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT — PHAT DIEM

We greatly appreciate your full reports on this important matter. The plight of non-Communists in North Vietnam who wish to go south has received a considerable play in the press.

2. As indicated in our telegram No. 134 of November 15,[†] we are anxious to have unclassified information about the Commission's activities generally, and more particularly in relation to this case. The situation of the Catholics in North Vietnam who wish to leave has caused much concern in Canada and the United States and a clear public statement of what the Commission has done and is doing about this case would clear up misapprehensions caused by news stories based on interviews with refugees who have escaped, and would make it plain that the Commission is not shirking its responsibilities. This would greatly assist us in dealing with queries from interested Canadian groups and from friendly governments. We would appreciate receiving cabled summaries of any public statements which the Commission issues on this case.

3. The State Department has informed us that Catholic groups are putting pressure on the United States Government to do something to assist the movement of persons who wish to leave the DR zone. We have briefed them on the facts of the Phat Diem case, including the refusal of the DR to accept the French offer to assist in transporting those who wish to leave the north, and have expressed the view that a United States Government offer would be similarly declined. We have suggested that the offer of a private organization such as the International Committee of the Red Cross might possibly be considered. We would be grateful for your comments on this possibility and any suggestions as to how the United States Government or private relief agencies might assist in the movement of the would-be refugees.

4. We have also expressed our worries to the State Department lest the attempt to achieve a propaganda victory over the DR on this issue, either within the Commission or elsewhere, might result only in strengthening the determination of the DR authorities to frustrate the movement of peoples from their area. As the ordinary forms of pressure are not likely to be effective, we may, in the last analysis, have to depend on the limited and grudging co-operating of the DR to ensure that those who wish to leave may do so. Therefore, whatever pressure we can exert should be in the direction to force such co-operation. The DR are obviously reluctant to permit inspection teams to see what is going on. Nevertheless, we must persist in trying to break down this attitude and to bring about as thorough and complete investigation by the inspection teams as can be achieved. Polish stalling and DR obstruction will obviously limit the success of this approach, but it appears to us to be more likely to produce the desired results than any other type of pressure, since it is fully in accordance with the letter and spirit of the agreement. I fully concur in your proposal to take a strong line in pressing for prompt DR compliance with the terms of Article 14 (d) and for as full supervision of their performance by the Commission as can be arranged. We should not be afraid to force a show down on this issue.

VIET MINH VIOLATIONS OF THE AGREEMENT

Your reports over the past few weeks indicate an increasing tendency by the Viet Minh to violate the spirit and evade the letter of the agreement with increasing impunity and a disposition on the part of the Poles to collude with them and abet their objectives by stalling methods within the Commission. This has emerged very clearly in connection with the Phat Diem incident, but is apparent also in connection with the restrictions on the movements of the fixed teams.

2. I believe that these circumstances require us to reconsider our tactics, though our strategy of carrying the Indians with us where possible and our objective of having the terms of the Cease Fire Agreements precisely carried out and by agreement would remain the same. It appears to us from this distance that the principal difficulty in getting the Commission to exert more effective pressure on the Viet Minh is the reluctance of the Indians to permit a split vote in the Commission. I believe it has been worth while up to now to have accepted this reluctance without demur as it has — I hope — enabled the Indians to discover on their own how the Communists interpret an agreement. It appears to me however that the pursuit of unanimity within the Commission is now passing the point of diminishing returns. I should think by this time the Indian Commissioner now sees Polish delaying tactics for what they really are, particularly in relation to the Phat Diem case, and he may now be more amenable to sharply defined differences of opinion being recorded in the minutes or even a few split votes so that the record will show that the Commission has been asserting its responsibilities in supervising the implementation of the terms of the agreement.

3. The time may now be ripe for us to take a considerably stronger line in the Commission, with a view to having the Commission make firmer recommendations to the Viet Minh for complying promptly and precisely with the terms of the agreement. I realize, of course, that this firmer line would result in effective action only in cases where the Indian Chairman is prepared to vote with you. You could warn the Indian Chairman privately that you believe that the Commission is not properly fulfilling its function and that in future cases of Polish evasiveness and stalling you will have to press for including in the minutes a clear record of your views and possibly, after consultation with us, in some cases actually request a clear-cut vote. If you think we can help you in this regard we can approach the Indian Government in New Delhi and express our apprehensions that unless we take firmer action the Poles will soon succeed in hamstringing the Commission almost completely.

4. I realize that a firmer line by the Commission may not succeed in getting much more satisfactory results from the Viet Minh, but it may have some ameliorating effect and at least the record of the Commission will be clear, and we will have discharged our own duty as members.

5. In this connection, I believe it important for your staff to make a careful record of the occasions when the Viet Minh have failed to carry out their obligations under the agreement and of the occasions when the Poles have blocked effective action by the Commission. These records may be useful to us in the future. You might consider the possibility of having such records incorporated in the Commission minutes, which we trust can be declassified at a later date. In the Phat Diem case you might consider presenting a memorandum of your views to the Commission recording instances of non-compliance by the Viet Minh with the terms of the agreement or the recommendations of the Commission. It may prove useful at a later date to have these matters in the official records. You may also wish to consider proposing that the Commission make a report to the Geneva Conference Powers which could subsequently be issued publicly concerning the activities of the International Commission up to the present time, even though such reports are not called for in the agreement.

6. I have already mentioned the need for unclassified reports of Commission activities which will assist us in meeting enquiries here. Most press stories published in Canadian papers come from American news services and are often biased. When Parliament reassembles in the New Year we will be under strong pressure to discuss the Commission's work and account for our own part in it, and until a better public record of Commission activities is available we will be in difficulties.

VIET MINH VIOLATIONS OF THE AGREEMENT

I was gratified to learn that you share my views as to the recent Viet Minh and Polish tactics. I agree fully that under the circumstances it is important that the record of the Commission should be clear and we should satisfy ourselves that we have discharged our duty as members and done all we could to perform our task impartially and to assist in the implementation of the agreement.

2. I agree that one of the principal difficulties is, as you suggest, the reluctance of the Indians to permit a split vote. But I think an equally, if not more important difficulty is the view of the Indians that the success of the Commission work depends almost entirely upon retaining the co-operation of the parties.

3. As you are aware, I had become disturbed over the attitude of the Indian Chairman and his willingness to accept compromises in order to retain co-operation of the parties which might jeopardize essential principles of the effectiveness of the controls which might be exercised by the Commission. After consultation with Macdonnell I had an informal discussion with Mr. Desai on November 23 before receipt of your telegram and explained to him our concern as to the lack of co-operation we were receiving and the danger that the Commission might be blamed later on for not having insisted strongly and quickly enough on compliance with certain provisions of the agreement. While Chairman gave me to understand that he shared our basic views and was convinced that Polish representative was the advocate of the Democratic Republic cause within the Commission, he argued, unconvincingly in my opinion, that a stronger line now might induce Poles to send a more difficult representative and that in giving Democratic Republic scope now the record would be incontrovertible that they had not carried out their Geneva commitments. I cannot agree that such an approach is realistic and compatible with our obligations as Commission members, particularly where there are time limits such as in Article 14 (d).

4. In the light of your message on November 24, I took a much stronger line on Phat Diem and general question of freedom of movement. Initial reactions from Chairman seem to have been favourable. It is too early to determine whether he will agree to firmer action. As I propose to approach him again on an informal basis, I feel that no representations should be made to the Indian Government until it becomes clear that there is to be no basic change in his attitude.

5. We will bear in mind your suggestion for clear-cut vote after consultation, but prompt consultation is quite impossible as long as telegraphic communications are so inadequate.

6. We find it very difficult now to send detailed reports even on major items which are being discussed. As soon as additional staff is available, I agree that a detailed score of Canadian, Polish and Democratic Republic action should be kept. In the meantime, whenever warranted, I shall endeavour to express for the record our views as to the failure of Viet Minh to carry out obligations and the blocking tactics of the Poles, although both of these may be difficult and delicate. Memorandum on Phat Diem may be desirable but on November 24 I made a detailed criticism of Democratic Republic performance so far in non compliance with Commission requests to relieve situation. I also suggested much stronger representations to the Democratic Republic. At this time, I feel that additional formal charge might defeat our purpose and slow up movement of refugees. Interim report to the co-Chairman of Geneva Conference is now to be prepared and forwarded probably early January.

7. Material for publication. Arrangements now made for weekly and periodical reports and more frequent press releases should meet at least part of requirements. I shall do all I can here to increase flow of unclassified material on activities of the Commission but Indian and Pole, for different reasons, seem reluctant to release adequate information on Commission activities.

WEEKLY PROGRESS REPORT FOR VIETNAM

1. Regroupment of forces. As the Democratic Republic authorities were not prepared to discuss further withdrawals in the central sector, the French appealed to the Commission to arbitrate suggesting that the Quang Gnai Province might be surrendered by Democratic Republic in two instalments at the end of 130 and 200 days respectively. The Chairman on November 16 was able to persuade the French to revert to their original proposal for evacuation of the province at the end of 200 days. They pointed out that they were making a further concession and that evacuation in two slices would have been easier.

2. The Commission urged both parties to discuss the matter in the Joint Commission. If no agreement is reached, the Commission will consider the issue formally on November 29. The Democratic Republic authorities were not prepared to make a move and insisted that the French should submit to the Joint Commission new and presumably more limited proposals.

3. Freedom of movement. On November 15 the Commission agreed:

(a) To send a mobile team to Nam Dinh where people being evacuated from Phat Diem to Haiphong by Democratic Republic launch will spend their first night.

(b) To instruct mobile teams at Phat Diem to request that Democratic Republic authorities issue permits to all people assembled there who wish to go south and not to process applicants only as transport facilities become available.

4. Latest reports suggest that close to 9,000 persons are awaiting evacuation. Over 1,100 had already left on November 17. If teams on the spot can expedite issuance of permits and transport facilities are inadequate, the Commission will be on better ground to request intervention of Democratic Republic Government in a week or so.

5. On November 16 the Commission considered the report from the mobile team which visited the Tra Ly area and agreed that a protest should be sent to the Democratic Republic authorities for the narrow interpretation given to his instructions by Democratic Republic officers who accompanied the team.

6. We suggested that the mobile team should return to the area to complete its task but the Chairman and the Pole felt that the team had already established that large groups of people were not, as claimed by the French, in any immediate danger. The question whether there were refugees in the area could be considered later as part of the wider issue of freedom of movement from the north.

7. A few refugees reported to fixed team at Haiphong that Democratic Republic soldiers had opened fire on group of 300 persons trying to leave for the south. One was believed to be dead, three wounded. The Commission discussed the incident on November 17 and agreed that

(a) The Chairman should suggest informally to Democratic Republic authorities that they might extend to the area where incident had occurred special procedure now being applied at Phat Diem and report action taken to the Commission.

(b) As soon as both parties have established the Committee to co-operate with Commission's Committee on Freedoms a study should be undertaken as to whether a simple and effective procedure for exit permits can be worked out both north and south and made known to all concerned.

8. Democratic freedoms. On November 15 the Commission agreed on a procedure to deal with the reports from the mobile teams which enquired into incidents in Central Vietnam. Essentially, the purpose of the discussion was to determine whether in the exercise of democratic freedom population had gone beyond permissible limits and whether authorities had taken action in excess of requirements of the situation. In the affirmative, Commission was to consider to what extent recommendations could be made to both parties. Detailed examination of the report began on November 16 and continued on November 17 but little progress was made as Pole attempted to prove that national Vietnam authorities were guilty because they had been slow in establishing local government and troops had used force unnecessarily. The Commission decided to complete general discussion of the first incident on its return from Saigon and to refer the whole problem to a Committee of experts for further study.

9. The Commission also considered a complaint from the Cambodian Foreign Minister transmitted through the Cambodian Commission against outrages allegedly perpetrated on Cambodians living in Southern Vietnam and alleged violations of the Cambodian frontier. The Commission agreed on the 17 to refer the complaint to the French Liaison Mission and to request comments on alleged violations relating to Article 14(c).

10. Teams. We have introduced in the Committee on Operations draft instructions to fixed teams which are based on compromise formula accepted by Commission and suggested informally to both sides. Initial Polish reaction was generally favourable, but final approval by the Commission will depend of course on concurrence of both parties. The Commission agreed to answer the question of future requirements for mobile teams. A study of mobile teams operations over last month or so will be prepared by Secretariat and discussed by Committee on Operations which will prepare a recommendation for the Commission. There is a growing need for personnel familiar with political and civil administration problems on these teams. We are studying how this may best be achieved and will inform you of any conclusions. The fixed team at Vinh sent a road reconnaissance party to Muong Sen on 15 November. The party reached Muong Sen on 16 November and preliminary reports indicate they had no trouble reaching Muong Sen. This indicates that the road reports received from the Democratic Republic of Vietnam about this route were as false as the other road reports received from the same source. A complete report will be made when the report is sent from the Vinh fixed team. On the third attempt a mobile team finally succeeded in delivering three jeeps to the fixed team at Tien Ten on the 18 November. This time the ferry was in position at Kong Suong (Mong Suong as decyphered). This team returned to Hanoi on 18 November and the details of their report will be forwarded when received.

WEEKLY PROGRESS REPORT FOR VIETNAM

I. Freedom of Movement

On its return from the Saigon visit the Commission discussed again Democratic Republic permit procedure and arrangements to evacuate refugees from Phat Diem. Further disturbing reports had been received from the mobile teams and individuals that local authorities were interpreting instructions in the narrowest fashion. People who were not originally residents at Phat Diem were turned back, others had to pay large sums for transportation etc.

2. On Wednesday November 24, as the Chairman did not seem prepared to make more than purely formal gestures to relieve the situation, I made a strong statement recording our dissatisfaction with the arrangements made so far and our concern over what appeared to be blocking tactics and lack of cooperation on the part of the Democratic Republic authorities. I suggested that the Commission should consider means of inducing higher degree of cooperation than had been received so far. It was agreed that the Commission would consider the progress of operations at Phat

Diem and the question of the general administrative arrangements to be made both north and south to ensure compliance with Article 14(d).

3. On November 25 the Commission approved tentatively the following steps on the basis of proposals we put forward.

(a) The Secretariat will prepare a survey on the basis of petitions received on general conditions both north and south as regards difficulties encountered in the implementation of 14(d).

(b) Both parties will be asked to appoint representatives to assist the Committee on Freedoms and to give detailed information on their exit permit procedure and on the number of people who have applied so far and been given assistance.

(c) The Committee on Freedoms will consider immediately the following problems and formulate recommendations which can be dealt with later when the parties set up their joint committee

(i) Are permits really required under 14(d)

(ii) If permits must be obtained

(a) Is the present system effective and reasonable to give effect to 14(d)

(b) Is the procedure for obtaining permits sufficiently known or can further steps be taken to publicize it

(c) Are people given freedom to meet peacefully to discuss whether they wish to exercise their right under 14(d)

(d) What are the considerations which are taken into account in the issuance of permits

(e) Are suggestions that people should move to another zone considered as an offence

(f) What is meant by assistance.

If these steps can be taken soon I hope that we may be able to make some progress in dealing with the problem.

II. Democratic Freedoms

4. The fixed team at Qui Nhon having reported that some incidents had occurred in the surrounding areas the Commission decided to send fixed team from Nha Trang and mobile team from Hanoi to investigate.

5. The French had enquired as to some 123 missionaries some time ago. The Democratic Republic reply being too broad and evasive the Commission decided to request information as to their whereabouts, precise charges against them so that they can be interviewed by mobile team.

6. The Commission completed its general discussion on first incident investigated by mobile team (Ai Nghia); an ad hoc committee will now undertake in the light of the Commissions discussion so far general study of whole series of reports dealing with incidents investigated by mobile team.

7. Further incidents have been reported in the south near Saigon. The Commission agreed to send another mobile team to investigate. Instructions for these teams (see paragraph 5 above) are being drafted by the Committee on Freedoms and will be approved by the Commission. In view of the difficulties which have arisen in discussion of earlier reports we urged that instructions should provide guidance so that teams can gather evidence on points required by the Commission to take such action as may be appropriate under the agreement.

III. Prisoners of War and Civilian Internees

(a) Deserters

8. Some time ago a French Union soldier of European origin reported to fixed team at Lao Kay and requested repatriation. He was handed over to local authorities for custody pending investigation which disclosed that both parties considered him as deserter. Both Chairman and Pole argued that a deserter was not a prisoner of war, he did not come under the provisions of the agreement and should therefore be released from provisional custody. I took the position that deserters particularly of European origin might be classified as prisoners of war and that Commission had to consider carefully legal basis for its ruling. The Pole was concerned that deserters if surrendered might be court martialled in contravention of Article 21(c). After some discussion it was agreed that

(a) Both parties would be asked whether they considered that deserter in question was a prisoner of war and if Commission agreed whether the French are prepared to repatriate him under the terms of 21(c).

(b) Both parties should indicate the number of persons now held considered to be deserters and their views as to whether these persons should be excluded from the application of 21(c).

The problem will be discussed later on with both parties. In the meantime the deserter remains in the custody of the Democratic Republic authorities at Lao Kay and is to be informed by fixed team of Commission action.

9. A fairly large number of deserters may still be held and I felt that careful consideration had to be given to this individual case now before the Commission. I should appreciate early advice by telegram on the question whether and if so when deserters can be considered as prisoners of war under international law and in the light of the provisions of the agreement.

(b) Civilian Internees

10. Mobile team which submitted report on Poulo Condore reported that provisions of the Geneva and of the Trung Gia (treatment of prisoners) Agreements were not made known to the prison officials, that 70 political prisoners were still being held and should be released and that 61 cases were doubtful and had to be examined. The Commission invited the French Union to take the necessary steps to release political prisoners agreed by both sides and to submit dossiers so that other cases could be dealt with.

(c) Prisoners of War

11. Each party has now submitted statements of prisoners of war and civilian internees surrendered of outstanding claims. These statements have been referred to the other party for comments and general position will be discussed with liaison officers in about 10 days.

IV. Reinforcement of Troops and Equipment

12. Democratic Republic authorities have complained that French have brought in war materials tanks, aircraft engines and military personnel in violation of Articles 16 and 17 of the Agreement. They suggested that control of entry and exit should be strengthened through fixed teams. Commission requested further particulars concerning personnel and equipment and at our suggestion will point out that early acceptance of Commissions proposals to ensure mobility of fixed teams within certain areas will make it possible to exercise closer supervision and control both north and south.

13. French are erecting new buildings at Tourane and have suggested that team should not be allowed to visit them. This raised the question of bases and the Commission agreed that the matter should be examined and recommendations made as to what constitutes a base or a new base under the terms of Article 19. It will be necessary to take into account in reaching conclusions the effect of regroupment of forces for instance at Tourane, French argue that constructions are meant to accommodate troops being evacuated from the north.

14. Question of checking of military material movements has arisen. Commission has agreed that teams should be allowed to check all such movements on the understanding that notification would only be required on cases coming under Article 17. Movement of equipment from one part of the country to the other does not come under the provisions of the agreement but Commission teams have to be permitted to check at both ends if the Commission is to be in a position to determine whether material arriving at one of the points of entry is new material coming under 17 or material being transferred from one part of the country to the other.

V. Teams

15. The Commission decided tentatively on November 23 that plans should be made for the establishment of fixed teams at Muong Sen and at Tan Chau early December.

16. In Operations Committee, Polish representative maintains the attitude that if part of fixed teams can be used as mobile teams then it must operate under the limitations laid down for mobile teams in Article 35.

VI. Saigon Office

17. Question of the precise title and status of the Saigon office has assumed some importance as French suspect that Polish plan may be to suggest setting up of Democratic Republic liaison mission in the south. There is also the question of the attitude of the National Government to the opening of new and larger commission branch in Saigon with possibly large Polish element. Matter is to be discussed informally by Commissioners.

VII. General

18. The Commission has been working under very great pressure meeting every day. It is now proposed to assist delegations to prepare adequately for meeting to give some notice of items to be placed on agenda and to establish some priority between various items which will be considered.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

At its meeting on November 30 the Commission considered a request submitted by French Union that mobile teams be sent to investigate conditions in respect of freedom of movement in Bui Chu, Thai Binh, Ninh Binh area.

2. The Chairman took a very firm line in his view when Democratic Republic authorities had not given any indication in spite of specific requests from the Commission that a procedure had been established to issue permits and that it was adequate. Perhaps unknown to the central government the local administration appeared to be fairly ineffective. The Commission had been patient but both parties had delayed taking steps to cooperate with the Committee on Freedom to tackle the question on a reasonable and effective basis. The Commission could no longer allow the present inadequate arrangements to continue. The matter had been under discussion for 7 weeks. The Democratic Republic authorities had had plenty of time to develop an adequate procedure. Now the question was whether they were prepared or not to carry out their obligations under 14 (d). The Commission would have an opinion on their performance.

3. After some discussion it was agreed that

(a) Two mobile teams would be sent to the area suggested by the French to report on the administrative arrangements made to implement 14 (c) and to suggest to what extent improvements might be required and the reaction of local authorities to such suggestions. The fixed team at Vinh will also investigate local conditions.

(b) The two parties will now be asked to set up their Joint Committee without any further delay.

(c) The Commission will discuss the whole matter with the Chief of the Democratic Republic Liaison Mission on December 1. The Chairman proposes to make very clear the views of the Commission as to the delay in setting up adequate procedure. The Chairman will also stress that teams should be allowed to perform their task without interference on the part of liaison officers or local authorities.

4. The action of the teams together with representations to central government and activities of the Committee on Freedoms should make it possible to achieve some results in this field. The most significant development is, however, firm attitude of the Chairman.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Hanoi, December 2, 1954

Dear Mike [Pearson],

As a neophyte and an ad hoc member of your Department I do not profess to know the protocol or propriety of this procedure of writing you personally. All I want to do is to give you my preliminary personal impressions of some of the features of this job which Canada has taken on in Indo-China.

In the official reporting and keeping you informed of what goes on from day to day I am fortunate indeed in having Cadieux, Crépault and Ballachey. You told me they were of your best and I can thoroughly subscribe to that, particularly in the case of Cadieux. To lose him at this stage through a breakdown in health or for any other reason would be most serious and indeed endanger the Canadian contribution to the work of the Viet Nam Commission. I question the wisdom of our contribution being so greatly dependent upon the health of one or two men, particularly in this part of the world. There should be a competent immediate reserve here and in the picture. At the moment we do not have it.

Megill and the military component are for the most part of good calibre for this job as it has progressed to this stage. So long as all Fixed Teams had not been placed, he had a few surplus officers which could be used for Mobile Teams and in emergencies. Now that the remaining Fixed Teams are to be sent out, he will have no surplus. You will have seen from the reports the ever growing demand for Mobile Teams by both the North and the South. This leaves the military extremely short and I think that some immediate relief of this situation is urgently required.

I detected a little standoffishness between the two departments, but this was largely due, I think, to reticence on the part of both components to criticize or adopt each other's methods of procedure. I think a few words of explanation to each, of the other's training and practice has brought about a closer understanding. The two elements are eager to work well together as one team. Improvements still remain to be made in this line, but on the whole, co-ordination is good and willingness to co-operate is excellent.

As you know, I came here prepared to do as instructed, maintain a judicial and impartially objective attitude on behalf of Canada in the task it had accepted. In London the C.I.G.S., Sir John Harding, said to me that it was a good objective, but I certainly would not find my Polish colleague had any such idea. Sir John, I have concluded, was probably right. A month's close association daily with the Polish Ambassador, and his subordinates, has convinced me that whatever his attitude and instructions may have been in the early stages of the Commission's work, he is definitely now playing the Communist game of obstruction, evasion, stalling, double talk, legalistic and technical objections and any other tactics he can employ to assist the D.R. authorities to carry out the provisions of the Geneva Agreement to the exclusive advantage of Communist policy. I would go so far at the moment to say that I think that he or someone of his political views is either directly or indirectly consulting with and advising the new D.R. regime as to how far it should go or not go in implementing the bare letter rather than the spirit of the Agreement.

As to the Indian Chairman, as far as I can gather from proceedings so far, his ideas of the Commission duties are, namely, that (1) the basic principle in our supervision and control is to retain the co-operation of the parties; and, (2) the best way to show impartiality is always to accord each side similar treatment, e.g., establish fixed teams at the same time in the North as in the South; if you suggest the D.R. do something they are reluctant to do, in one matter, you must simultaneously suggest the French do the same in some other matter. If you release the prisoner LY TAN LY in the North, you must find grounds for releasing the prisoner CHO BHANG in the South. The Pole calls it reciprocity — and the Indian Chairman calls it treating the parties impartially.

My own view is that we can only go so far in attempting to win co-operation of the parties. When to win co-operation involves some sacrifice of, or deviation from, principles of freedom and justice as we understand them in Canada, we will have to draw the line, have a show-down, a split vote if necessary, and insist on the Geneva Powers taking a hand in the matter of enforcement of the terms of the Agreement. This might involve informing the Geneva Conference Powers on the basis of a Canadian minority report. But if the Indian Chairman, in spite of private verbal assurances to the contrary, overlooks what to me is obvious avoidance (but not barefaced or provable evasion) of the spirit of the Agreement, then to maintain our self-respect, and Canada's prestige in the West, we will have to take a firm stand not only on the official record, but publicly disassociate ourselves with any such action on the part of the Commission. I have not yet completely figured out his attitude, but in the last few days there have been indications that he may, after some delay, take the same attitude as we do on basic issues.

Naturally I would hope to consult you before taking any final stand, but the fact is that our communications are such, that, except through British facilities here, which we must use sparingly, I cannot wire you and expect to receive a reply in time to know your views by the time a decision must be taken. Such a situation could develop on any one of several issues now or shortly to be under discussion and of which we have tried to keep the Department informed, for example, freedom of movement of Mobile Teams, Instructions to Fixed Teams, the exercise of rights to move South, the importation of war matériel, what constitutes a new military base. If I defer a decision on such matters as they arise on the agenda it will be interpreted as "stalling tactics" which are just the kind of tactics we are fighting every day.

In my wire of November 26, (No. 197), it was only after the fullest consideration that I discouraged for the present your suggestion that you might assist by approaching the Indian Government about Chairman Desai's attitude. I think he is doing his best to be impartial, subject always to his basic principle to do nothing to alienate the co-operation of the parties. Any suggestion that I had officially questioned his impartiality or the wisdom of his decisions would undoubtedly make our position with him here much more difficult. Macdonnell can give you this aspect in more detail. With our limited contacts here and belated outside information, you will be in a better position to judge whether such intervention is advisable, bearing in mind that I have to live and work with Desai and retain or forfeit his support half a dozen times a day or more.

I will do what I can further in providing unclassified information before Parliament meets early in the new year, but the D.R. have adopted regulations of very strict censorship, and the Indian's respect for the power of the Press and concern to keep the public informed by no means matches ours.

The next stage now looming up is a build-up for Communist propaganda and election purposes of the terrible weakness and ineptitude of the DIEM administration and its complete inability to govern, as witness the alleged "reprisals" taking place in the South against the former Viet Minh sympathisers, some of which are probably Communist cadres, purposely instigating disorder in the village populations of the South.

The suggestion will, I anticipate, soon be advanced in the Commission that unless the Commission can induce the South to eliminate alleged reprisals and disorders, the Commission cannot expect co-operation of the D.R. on the matter of free movement of Catholic populations from the North. There are suggestions that there are some shady doings in the South which would rouse public opinion, and which, when capitalized and publicized in the North, will they hope deter people from going South and possibly materially influence the elections. The D.R. authorities will claim that under Article 14 (c) they should be allowed to operate freely in the South and make life as difficult as possible for DIEM and his regime.

I have talked with M. Sainteny on a number of occasions but he has given no indication of the real purpose of his mission here or how he is succeeding. It would be helpful if our Embassy in Paris could give us some information on this point.

Your wire was very encouraging, helpful, and timely but I would appreciate a bit more timely assistance and expression of views in general by the Department on our problems. Meanwhile, I shall use my best judgment and hope not to let the side down. Morale of delegation is good in spite of difficult living conditions. There are a few weak spots (besides myself) but we will eliminate them as fast as we can. The problem of health and some regular leave for personnel, both External Affairs and Military, is one to which we will have to give immediate consideration.

For the moment I shall have to leave the speculative and contemplative political reporting to Mayrand and Duder as our work now takes us from 16 to 18 hours every day. My health is good and I hope I am earning my wages.

Respects and regards,

Sincerely,

SHERWOOD [LETT]

GENERAL GIAP'S APPEAL TO THE COMMISSION

1. In a 14 page memorandum submitted yesterday to the Commission, General Giap claims that while the Democratic Republic have scrupulously carried out the Geneva Agreement Diem's regime at the instigation of the United States and with French support have seriously violated the main provisions of the Agreement.

2. Giap charges that:

(a) Diem carries out a deliberate policy of reprisals, discrimination and massacre in the French zone;

(b) United States now propose to introduce additional military equipment and personnel in South Vietnam to turn into a United States military base the French zone which is now included as a result of the Manila Pact in the protective zone of the South East Asia military bloc;

(c) French military leaders as signatories to the Agreement are associated with the violation of the Agreement and must bear responsibility.

3. The attention of the Commission is drawn to these violations with the request that it will take appropriate steps to ensure compliance with the relevant provisions of the Agreement.

4. The local Hanoi radio station and papers are giving considerable publicity to the memorandum.

5. It is likely that Diem, French and United States leaders directly charged with violations will respond with corresponding vigour and that, as a result, co-operation between the parties and task of the Commission will become even more difficult.

6. Text of memorandum follows by bag.

GIAP'S APPEAL TO THE COMMISSION

1. At the Commission meeting on December 7 Chairman reported that copy (in Vietnamese) of Giap's memorandum had been left with his private secretary Sunday evening with notice that it would be released to the press Monday and copies sent to the co-chairmen of the Geneva Conference.

2. Chairman wrote to Chief of Democratic Republic liaison mission pointing out that document would be published before Commission had had time to study it. In his personal name he added that in his view such action was not likely to improve atmosphere or to assist co-operation between the parties.

3. Chief of Democratic Republic liaison has now advised Chairman that publication will be postponed until December 8 but that under the circumstances his government felt that they had to maintain their appeal to the Commission.

4. Chairman suggested that before publication of the document Commission should announce its decision to submit to co-chairmen a report on its activities in view of General Giap's statement. Report might cover four months period (August 1-December 11) instead of August - end of December as originally intended. This would convey the idea that the Commission had not been inactive while violations are alleged to have taken place. The Commission agreed that such a release should be issued.

5. Later on at my suggestion when discussing the press release informally with him the Chairman agreed to advise his government that through appropriate channels they might warn the co-chairmen of the decision to issue a report and a press release on this point.

6. The Commission will discuss Giap's memorandum on Monday December 13.

7. Action required: Assume that text of Giap's memorandum will be available to you through other channels. Would appreciate receiving guidance as to the line to take when the Commission discuss Giap's memorandum. Chairman's initial reaction is that no reply should be made to what is essentially a propaganda move on the part of the Democratic Republic Government.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

WEEKLY PROGRESS REPORT, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 3 TO THURSDAY, DECEMBER 9 INCLUSIVE

I. Freedom of Movement

1. Saturday, December 3 the Commission decided:

- (a) to withdraw half of the mobile team now at Phat Diem;
- (b) to instruct the rest of the team to undertake an enquiry in the surrounding area in accordance with instructions issued to the mobile teams, investigation of general problem in Biu Chu etc.;
- (c) to provide a report on the discrepancy between the number of people who have been issued exit permits and those who have reached French zone;
- (d) to complete the task undertaken, e.g., ensure in particular that those who are in need are given assistance while awaiting their permit and that priests and nuns who wish to go south are given the necessary permits.

2. The Commission is urging Democratic Republic authorities to apply special permit procedure to a group of some 52 refugees from Vinh who are destitute in Hanoi and have been awaiting necessary authorization for more than eight days.

II. Democratic Freedoms

3. On December 6 the Commission instructed the Committee on Freedoms to prepare, for consideration on December 9, a survey of messages received from fixed teams in Qui Nhon since despatch of mobile team to investigate alleged murders and atrocities in the area. On December 9 the Commission instructed the team at Nha Trang and the mobile team operating out of Tourane to investigate these alleged murders and atrocities and to send by telegram interim reports on the outcome. On December 9 also, the Commission urged French High Command to draw to the attention of civil and military authorities concerned the provisions of Articles 14 (c) and (d) as well as 15 (d) and (inculpations?) of 22.

III. Depots of Ammunition and Arms, (Article 5)

4. The French have complained that depots have been discovered. The quantities involved are not considerable. The French argue that these depots, which have been carefully prepared, suggest a plan to resume guerilla operations later on. Commission agreed, on December 7, to refer the complaint to Democratic Republic for comments.

IV. Reinforcement of Troops and Equipment (see paragraph (11) of our telegram No. 220 of December 2)†

5. On December 7 the Commission agreed to refer to both parties the recommendation of the Operations Committee on the import of wheeled vehicles. Teams will be instructed to observe and record import of wheeled vehicles. If later on there is a complaint that such vehicles are used to equip new military units data will be available to undertake an investigation. Import without prior notification of vehicles fitted with or for military wireless and armament will be reported as violations of Article 17.

V. Resistance of Armed Units in North Vietnam (see paragraph 2 of our telegram No. 162 of November 12)†

6. The French reported that no progress had been made in the Joint Commission and requested the Commission's intervention. Commission met the chiefs of the two liaison missions and again urged them to try to work out a solution before next week, otherwise they should be ready to argue their case before the Commission on Monday the 13th. The Democratic Republic have delayed unduly and the Chairman exerted some pressure to induce them to state their position clearly in a week if they are not prepared to accept some reasonable solution in the meantime. Up to now the Democratic Republic have not expressed their views but merely invited the French to reply to questions. French profess not to know the answer and to consider questions irrelevant in any case until point of principle has been (dealt?) with. Are these partisans rebels or are they members of the French Union Forces who did not receive orders to surrender or were not allowed to (word omitted — by?) Democratic Republic authorities?

VI. The Duties and Functions of the Fixed Teams

7. On December 2 the Commission had general discussion on this subject. It was recognized that the instructions as given to fixed teams are proving inadequate and that arrangements had to be made so that the Commission through its means can exercise adequate supervision and control, particularly as regards the military provisions of the agreement. The Chairman, in consultation with the Committees on Freedoms and on Operations if necessary, undertook to revise and submit for consideration early in the week the draft instructions prepared by each committee. An attempt would be made to ensure whether essential tasks could be covered under the agreement, if not, parties would be asked to interpret terms broadly. If they did not agree, and Commission felt that adequate supervision and control were not achieved, further steps would then have to be considered. We made the point that if the Commission and the parties agreed that effective controls and supervision were intended under the Agreement arrangements and instructions had to be made or issued on that basis.

8. The (Canadian ?) paper which was considered on December 9 pointed to the various tasks of control, inspection, investigation and observation allotted to fixed and mobile teams by virtue of the Geneva Agreement. It stated that there was no bar to portion of a fixed team becoming a mobile team provided the mandatory provisions of the Agreement under Article 16 (g) and 17 (f) read with Article 20 and Article 35 are fully observed. It further stated that zones of action would be established for fixed teams when (a) operating in their fixed role and (b) operating in their mobile role. After some discussion it was agreed that at their fixed location teams should carry out control at least once a day. It was further agreed that mobile teams drawn from fixed teams could move freely: (a) for purposes of control and investigation in 10 kilometre zone along the land and sea frontier to Vietnam; (b) to accede to this zone and for purposes of observation and inspection in broader areas to be defined by the Committee on Operations and submitted to the high commands for approval. Teams could move on their own initiative and without prior approval of the Commission on two hours notice for one day trips and on reasonable notice (but not exceeding 24 hours) for longer tours.

9. The instructions which are to be reviewed and to be finalized on December 10 contain also detailed guidance for the handling of petitions.

10. The instructions, if approved, should make it possible for Commission to exercise a more adequate control of the implementation of the military clauses of the Agreement and represent, in my view, satisfactory outcome of long and difficult negotiations.

VII. Teams

11. On December 9 the Commission drew the attention of the French Liaison Mission to obstructive attitude of provincial Vietnamese official who refused to allow Nha Trang team to undertake enquiry and sought an assurance that French High Command would secure cooperation of National Government. Furthermore teams in the south have been delayed because of alleged weather difficulties. Commission urged French Liaison Mission to take all possible steps to ensure that teams proceed without any avoidable further delays.

12. The Democratic Republic High Command will now take charge of Gia Lam Hanoi (airport) on January 1. Commission decided on December 9 that mobile team would supervise handover. French have given notice that planes at the disposal of Commission would only continue to use the airport if they are satisfied that adequate security standards are maintained.

VIII. General

13. The Commission decided on December 3 to visit Saigon before Christmas. It will leave Hanoi on December 15, visit fixed team at Qui Nhon on the way down and return on the 19th visiting teams at Ba Ngoi and Nha Trang on the way back.

14. Chairman proposes to leave for New Delhi around December 30 for short leave (15 days) and consultations in New Delhi, Polish Ambassador leaving about December 29 via Paris for Warsaw for same purpose and duration. Commission will continue to sit with their alternates acting.

GIAP'S APPEAL

I am disturbed that the DR should attempt to use the Commission as a forum for propaganda blasts. This is a most unwelcome departure from previous practice whereby specific complaints which could be supported by proper documents and evidence were put before the Commission and I trust you will react vigorously in the Commission discussions.

2. I suggest that when the Commission discusses this matter you should take the line that the Commission has no obligation to deal with what is clearly a broad propaganda charge; that if any reply to Giap is considered necessary, it should be pointed out that the charges against the Diem Government are unsubstantiated by any documentary or other evidence, and since there are no specific alleged violations of the agreement to investigate, there is nothing that the Commission can do; that the charges against the United States are similarly unsubstantiated, and appear moreover to be based on newspaper speculation; and that while the Commission has an obligation to take note of threatened violations of the agreement, it must proceed very carefully in its investigations of alleged threatened violations and must have much more detailed information than the Giap memorandum provides.

3. If a reply is made to General Giap, it should also be pointed out that the agreement provides adequate procedural machinery for dealing with any legitimate complaints about violations of the agreement and that the publication of the memorandum before the Commission had had adequate time to study it does not appear to accord with the provisions of Article 25, requiring the Commanders of the Forces of the two parties to afford "all possible assistance and co-operation" to the International Commission.

4. Giap's memorandum is not available here in full. (Pearson)

GIAP'S APPEAL TO THE COMMISSION

1. Commission this morning, December 13, considered Giap's memorandum which he had sent to Chairman of Commission and co-chairman of the Geneva agreement.

2. During course of discussion chairman stated that he takes serious view of the memorandum and feels that some allegations in it referring to work of Commission imply a reflection on Commission itself. I made no comment on this view.

3. Commission in agreement that there should be a formal reply to Giap but along general lines. This reply will not be drafted immediately since Commission considers that allegations levelled by Giap at Diem's Government and by implication French High Command in respect of the non-fulfilment of Articles 9 and 14(c) of the agreement should be considered by Commission when it has before it (later this week) draft of report to co-chairmen on work of Commission during last 4 months.

4. By following this procedure Commission will be able to determine extent to which Giap's allegations are substantiated in fact and will provide indication of action Commission has taken on complaints already referred to it by Democratic Republic. Commission will thus be in a position, if considered advisable, to give Giap a tabular statement of action taken on Democratic Republic complaints and enquire whether there are others which he would like Commission to consider. I suggested that complaints to Commission by parties to the agreement should follow the procedures already laid down and that it was undesirable that either party be encouraged to use other means to inform Commission of its complaints. A further advantage in considering Giap's memorandum with Commission's report is that it will give Commission an opportunity to determine the extent to which each party to the agreement has fulfilled its obligations. It may be possible to indicate that we do not accept in full Giap's statement that 'the high command of the APVN has implemented that agreements signed in the most loyal and strict way from their date of entry into force'.

5. Commission also agreed to refer Giap's memorandum to French Liaison Mission for comment and in particular for comments on that part of the memorandum in which Giap claims that Manila Treaty (SEADT) and subsequent Franco-United States talks on assistance for Vietnam and Lawton Collins' mission contravene

Geneva Agreement. I urged that if Giap's letter was to be referred to French Liaison Mission for comment we should not, repeat not, ask for observation on any particular part of it. This view did not commend itself to my two colleagues.

6. It is my impression that the Pole is determined to press the Commission to make some comment on its reply on the extent to which the Manila Agreement the Franco-United States talks and Collins' mission conflict with Article 19 of the agreement — he mentioned this aspect of the problem this morning. This could be a sticky question which we would like the Commission to avoid but my colleagues may not agree with my views. I should appreciate your comments on this problem and particularly on Collins' mission and statements. I could, if you think it desirable, use some of the arguments which Mr. Eden made to Mr. Nehru when he replied to the latter's criticism of SEATO. (We have a copy of this letter here). From the Canadian standpoint are there any specific or other arguments we should advance?

7. A reply on this point I think should stress that the Commission will continue to control and supervise the implementation of the agreement. If in spite of this control it is claimed that violations have occurred the Commission will then be prepared to investigate. It cannot concern itself, however, with broad claims that violations may occur in the future as a result of other agreements which may be made or policies which may be adopted by countries which are not party to this agreement.

8. While the Chairman had first suggested that there should be no reply it may be significant that he has now indicated that the Commission should deal fairly, fully and completely with Giap's memorandum and therefore with the points concerning the Manila Pact and Collins' mission and statements.

9. Reply needed before Monday, December 27 if necessary through United Kingdom facilities.

WEEKLY PROGRESS REPORT — FRIDAY DECEMBER 10 TO FRIDAY DECEMBER 17

I. Freedom of Movement

The Democratic Republic authorities have complained that there have been forced evacuations to the South and they suggested that the Commission should undertake investigations in refugee camps and invite the French High Command to disseminate information concerning Article 14 (d). In view of the understanding given by the Chief of the French Liaison Mission that the National Vietnamese Government are now prepared to give an assurance that they will carry out obligations under Article 14 (c) and (d) it was thought that it would be better to await the receipt of this assurance before dealing formally with the Democratic Republic request. In the meantime, the Democratic Republic authorities will be invited to indicate which refugee camps should first be investigated. We have taken the line that the Democratic Republic request should be acceded to and that in carrying out investigation the teams should also, as was done in Nam Dinh, ascertain whether refugees have other complaints.

2. The Democratic Republic Government have requested the Commission to send a team to observe in Saigon the trial of members of the Movement for the Defence of Peace. While the Pole and the Chairman were prepared to agree, I took the line that it would be improper for the Commission to take this course as such action would be based on the suspicions of one party, might be interpreted as interference with the administration of justice in the south, and cast a reflection on the impartiality of the Vietnamese courts, and might result in jeopardizing promised cooperation of southern administration. The Commission finally agreed that before any action should be taken, further information should be obtained whether the accused were being dealt with by a civil or military tribunal, whether the trial was only in the preliminary or had reached the final stage and whether proceedings were public or not. I also obtained their agreement that this information should not be obtained through our Saigon Office but through the normal channel e.g. the French Liaison Mission here. I am afraid that Democratic Republic intervention may prelude another attempt to exploit for propaganda purposes the Commission's next visit to Saigon and to create embarrassment in relations with the National Vietnamese Government. The French have now reported that trial is still in preliminary stage. Investigation is in camera but accused will be tried publicly before civil tribunal. Commission has agreed that authorities concerned should be given notice that cases are being considered by commission.

3. Resistance of armed units in North Vietnam (see paragraph 6 of telegram No. 243 of December 10).† At the meeting on December 13, the Commission discussed this question with the chiefs of the 2 liaison missions. The French maintain that the partisans were members of their armed forces and that the order to surrender was in fact intended to include them in plan of regroupment. The Chairman on behalf of the Commission has asked the French to indicate whether there is any evidence in the records of the Trung Gia or of the Joint Commissions that there has been any discussion on the point whether these partisans' movements would be included in regroupment foreseen under Article 15(f)(1). The Polish representative takes the view that if the partisans were members of the French armed forces, the provisions of 15(f)(1) have been violated. It is expected that the information required will be provided within a week when the Commission will have to determine whether the partisans were under the effective control of the French forces and, if not, whether they can be considered as civilians entitled to the provisions of Article 14 (d).

IV. Activities and Functions of Teams

4. On December 10, the Commission confirmed its earlier decision that mobile teams drawn from fixed teams should move freely in a 10 kilometer zone along the frontier and should consequently be permitted to accede to this zone through roads in adjacent area which may be wider. In this wider area, teams will be authorized to observe (not to inspect) but it is understood that this will cover right to establish contact with local authorities to stop, receive petitions, etc.

5. Instructions are to be referred to both parties and made available to teams and liaison officers for discussion around December 20 so that any difficulties may be cleared up and whole scheme may come into effect on January 1st.

6. In line with the Commission's decision of November 30 that a general reconnaissance of the Chinese border be carried out, a preliminary step in considering the request of the French Union that fixed teams should be established at other points on the Chinese border to prevent the alleged importation of arms and military equipment, a mobile team was dispatched to the area of Cao Bang on December 14. Another team is slated for dispatch to the Lai Chau area on December 19. Democratic Republic authorities have refused permission to have these reconnaissances carried out by French Union aircraft so Commission has decided to try to cover the whole border area by road reconnaissance.

7. Reports have been received from the fixed teams at Vinh and at Haiphong that there has been interference by local authorities with mail addressed to the Commission and that petitioners, particularly in the case of Vinh, have had to apply to the liaison officers for permission to accede to fixed team. The commission advised the chiefs of the 2 liaison missions today (December 13) that strict instructions should be sent to all liaison officers as well as the local authorities to ensure that, in the future, correspondence addressed to the commission should not be mishandled and that the local population should have free access to the Commission's teams.

8. A mobile team consisting of the Air Advisers of all 3 delegations has been formed to assist with the taking over of the Gia Lam airport at Hanoi. This airport, which remained under the technical control of the French Union, will be handed over officially to Democratic Republic control on December 31 but the team expect to supervise the handover commencing immediately and continuing until January 10.

9. On December 14 the Commission considered Democratic Republic reply to protest concerning attitude of liaison officer who accompanied mobile team to Trayly. It was agreed that in the future in requesting agreement of High Command the Commission should specify the tasks to be given to the teams and indicate in general terms area within which they will operate together with the broad nature of their mission whether observation, enquiry, investigation. The liaison officers in the future should be instructed to give a liberal interpretation to the area of movement and to avoid restricting arbitrarily the tasks of the team.

10. After certain delays occasioned by bad weather the fixed team at Muong Sen was finally established and commenced operations on December 13 simultaneously with the fixed team at Tan Chau thus completing the establishment of fixed teams called for in Article 35 of the Geneva Agreement.

11. The necessary (preface?) and appendices to the fixed team instructions reported on fully in our last weekly progress report were completed by the Operations Sub Committee on December 13 and handed to the Chairman on that date.

V. General

12. Draft report on first 4 months of the activities of the Commission has been circulated and will be discussed on December 20 and probably finalized before departure of Chairman and Polish Ambassador on December 26 or 27. First draft gives somewhat optimistic impression as to the record so far of both parties and we will have to press for amendments devised to give more exact and in some respects more detailed picture of what has actually happened.

13. The USIS have suggested that a film might be prepared with their assistance on Commission activities. Pole reported that before end of the month a team from Polish Film Institute would undertake similar project. At our suggestion it was agreed these schemes should be considered by committee on information to be set up under Secretariat PRO. I feel that through this committee it may be possible for us to develop projects, to publicize work of the Commission and increase volume of available non-classified material on its work.

14. The Commission on December 14, referred for comments to the Democratic Republic authorities a request from the French concerning war graves (Article 23). No progress has been made in Joint Commission and Commission agreed to express hope that matter which is bound to create serious sentimental concern should be settled satisfactorily and soon.

15. I have already reported Commission's discussion concerning the handling of the reply to General Giap's memorandum (see our telegram No. 248 of December 13).

Hanoi, December 27, 1954

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Repeat New Delhi No. 42.

WEEKLY PROGRESS REPORT DECEMBER 20 TO 25 INCLUSIVE

I. Regroupment of Forces(a) Transfer of Haiphong Perimeter

Commission had preliminary discussion on December 20 concerning principles and procedure to be adopted in processing claims and counter claims as regards removal of equipment. Already disputes have arisen and petitions are being received. It was decided that an attempt should be made to get both parties to agree to follow generally Hanoi precedent. The Commission met chiefs of both liaison missions on December 23 for preliminary exchange of views.

2. The Democratic Republic representative requested that there should be no further removals, that the two parties should develop an agreed definition of what constituted "common property" and that inventories should be checked through joint teams.

3. After some discussion the Chairman suggested on behalf of Commission that parties might indicate by December 24 whether they accepted the following working principle. Ban on removal would cover property belonging to public institutions or (concerns?) of public utility, there should be no removal which might interfere with continued operation of services affecting life or property of the civil population. If the above general principle is accepted,

(a) The French should issue instructions that no removals inconsistent with it will be effected.

(b) Inventories will be prepared if the Democratic Republicans desire, with the assistance of mobile teams of the International Commission, to ensure that above principle has been observed.

(c) Inventories with appropriate comments by mobile teams will be referred to Democratic Republic authorities for examination.

(d) In the meantime, if any removals are to take place, French will give notice and International Commission, through mobile teams, will determine whether these removals are compatible with the agreed principle.

5. These arrangements are based on Hanoi experience, take into account responsibility of the party which is to retain control of the area until the date foreseen for handover (Article 14 (b)) and that of the Commission for investigating complaints as certain removals may constitute violation of agreement and lead to incidents interfering with orderly transfer.

6. At the meeting on December 24 it transpired that

(a) both parties agreed that administrative and technical files should not be removed.

(b) The Democratic Republic representative claimed that all equipment should be left while French suggested that United States lend-lease and reserve material should be removed.

(c) The Democratic Republic representative claimed also that all stocks should be left, the French were prepared to leave three months supply.

(d) As to inventories, Democratic Republic insisted on joint teams. Chairman pointed out that all equipment and stocks could not be left behind as area had been base for French war effort during last years. Equipment and supplies exceeded requirements of Haiphong itself. As to joint teams they were incompatible with responsibilities of French control of the area and French could not delay transfers until last minute.

7. Democratic Republic insisted that detailed arrangements should be worked out in Joint Commission. Commission agreed on the understanding that it would intervene again unless agreement can be reached within a week.

(b) Withdrawals in the Central Sector

8. Both parties have now provided material in support of their case. Matter has been referred to special ad hoc committee for study and report.

II. Deserters and Civilian Internees

9. Commission decided on December 20 to refer to committee of legal experts question on whether deserters can be considered as prisoners of war and whether action can be taken under the agreement to dispose of these cases. Two alleged deserters have turned up in Hanoi and requested repatriation to Tunisia. (see our telegram No. 198 of November 26). French have expressed unwillingness to send prisoners as requested by Commission concerning 61 alleged politics prisoners. Commission agreed that French as they suggest, might review these cases and arrange for the release of those they consider to be political prisoners. Other cases can be reviewed later by Saigon office, if necessary, with liaison officers from both sides.

III. Freedoms

11. It has now been formally agreed that work of the Petitions Branch will be coordinated by Freedoms Committee which has been instructed to make recommendations as to how improvements can be effected in handling of petitions.

12. The Committee on Freedoms has also been instructed to review reports of mobile teams which investigated exit permit arrangements in the north and to prepare comprehensive report including recommendations for improved and similar procedure both north and south by mid-January.

IV. Reinforcement of Troops and Equipment

13. (Paragraph 12 of our telegram No. 198 of November 26). Report from fixed team at Saigon disclosed that no movement of personnel had occurred as alleged by Democratic Republic authorities but examination of manifest of ship involved (Viet Nam) established that aircraft engines were imported. As French claim that engines had been sent to Japan for maintenance, Commission has enquired as to the number, specifications, and date they were sent and invited comments as to why no notification was sent to Commission.

V. Report of the Secretary General

14. On Monday December 20 the Commission had a preliminary discussion both in general terms and on specific points. Revision of report in the light of Commissioners' comments was assigned to Committee on information.

15. The revised draft was further discussed on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday when final text was approved.

16. Commission decided that copies of the report should be sent to co-chairman with suggestion that Commission members governments be authorized to release it by a certain date (we suggested early in January if possible) and that copies might be circulated also to conference governments.

17. Copies of report going forward by bag.

VI. Teams

18. The mobile teams in the Tourane and Nha Trang district continued to be hampered by weather. In case of Tourane local representatives of National Government have been less than cooperative despite the efforts of the French Union Liaison officers to expedite the enquiry. The team was recalled by the Commission to give a full account of the reasons for their delay. It will resume its investigation on December 28.

19. Mobile team for road reconnaissance of the Chinese border in the area of Cao Bang successfully completed their mission and are at present working on their report. Second team on the same general mission departed as scheduled and word has been received that they have reached Lai Chau.

20. The team supervising the technical handover of the Gia Lam airport have presented an interim report in which they state that they cannot carry out the tasks assigned to them until such time as the Democratic Republic and French Union authorities reach agreement on the return of certain types of civilian airport equipment allegedly removed by the French civilian aviation authorities prior to October 10 and subsequently replaced by French military equipment which they now wish to remove under the terms of a protocol entered into by both parties. Both parties have been urged to work out arrangements which will ensure maintenance of required standards. Mobile team will observe handover.

VII. Instructions to Fixed and Mobile Teams

21. On December 20 Commission finally approved instructions. There was long discussion concerning definition of powers of observation of mobile teams drawn from fixed teams while in sphere of action. While I felt that instructions should specify that team could watch, examine or undertake reconnaissance, Polish Ambassador and Chairman argued that this went beyond strict interpretation of the agreement and that these powers could be requested later if in the light of experience it appeared that Commission needed them to exercise effective supervision and control. In order to avoid further delays I agreed on the understanding that, if necessary, definition would be broadened later to ensure effective and equal control and supervision both north and south.

DESPATCH 296

Hanoi, December 27, 1954

FUNCTIONS AND ACTIVITIES OF THE FIXED TEAMS

I attach the Secretary-General's paper entitled "Instructions for Fixed and Mobile Teams", as it was approved by the Commission on December 20; this paper was sent to the fixed teams and the liaison officers on December 23 for discussion. If any difficulties arise it is hoped that they will be clarified in time for the instructions to come into effect on January 1, 1955. I also attach a map to give you a visual picture of the system of control envisaged for the fixed teams under the new instructions.

2. One of the main features of the scheme is that it has been developed within the framework of the Agreement, strictly interpreted: the parties are merely invited to assist the Commission in carrying out tasks of a nature and in a fashion specified in the Agreement. The Polish Ambassador has repeatedly made the point that such an approach was the only one which was likely to ensure willing compliance on the part of the governments concerned.

3. The arrangements suggested may ensure a fair degree of supervision and control at the fixed points: the teams are to carry out inspections at ports and airports at least daily. In some cases, the teams may even be enlarged to enable them to cope with the additional duties which such frequent checks may involve. It is clear that if these arrangements come into effect on January 1, the Commission will be in a position to exercise closer control in the South, where a few ports and airports have to be watched, than in the North where possible gaps have yet to be surveyed; for this reason, the Commission will have to send reconnaissance teams quickly and to develop adequate machinery to ensure that a corresponding degree of control is provided in the North.

4. The teams will be free to move along the roads in adjacent areas which give access to the frontier zone where they can exercise full control. In these wider areas, the teams will have broad powers of observation for the simple reason that if they are to exercise control in the frontier zones they must have access to them and while they are travelling outside these zones to reach them, it is impossible for the members of the teams not to observe. The teams, however, will be free to move on short notice: two hours if they are to return to their fixed location on the same day, not more than 24 hours for longer journeys.

5. These arrangements should make it possible for the Commission to exercise a fair degree of supervision and control as regards some of the military provisions of the agreement; additional arrangements will have to be made later on, if necessary, to ensure that control and supervision can be exercised as regards the political provisions of the Agreement. It may well be that these additional arrangements may not be feasible on the basis of a literal interpretation of the Agreement and that the parties will have to be invited to agree "to stretch" somewhat such an interpretation to allow the Commission to perform the tasks it considers necessary. Approval of the attached instructions represents, in my view, a step in the right direction but other steps in other directions may yet be required.

6. Appendix III contains useful guidance to the teams on the handling of petitions. In the past, there has been some confusion in the disposal of complaints and petitions and the action taken by the teams has not been uniform. Specific instructions as to what should be done in given cases were needed and should facilitate their task.

7. It is clear that as long as control of the implementation of the military provisions could be ensured within the framework of the Agreement, in its most literal and narrow interpretation possible, the necessary arrangements had to be made without delay, and, to this extent, the Commission in one important area may be in a position to satisfy itself that the parties are complying with the provisions of the Agreement. I anticipate that it will be much more difficult to obtain agreement for the development of the necessary machinery of control in other fields where the provisions of the Agreement are not so specific.

8. As I reported in my telegram No. 269 of December 27,[†] there was a lengthy discussion in the Commission on December 20 concerning the definition of the powers of observation to be enjoyed by the mobile teams drawn from fixed teams when travelling in the sphere of action. While I felt that the instructions should specify that these mobile teams could watch, examine, or undertake reconnaissance, the Chairman and my Polish colleague argued that this kind of observation went beyond the strict interpretation of the Agreement and that such powers could be requested later if, in the light of experience, it appeared that the Commission needed them to exercise effective supervision and control.

9. The Chairman held the view that at this stage we were better advised to base the actions of our mobile teams drawn from fixed teams in the sphere of action on a strict legal interpretation of the Agreement. If this were done, it would, in his opinion, be difficult for either party to hamper the teams in the exercise of the duties assigned to them by the new instructions. Although I recognized the merit of the Chairman's argument and appreciated the undesirability of using the word "inspection" when defining "observation", I nonetheless hoped that I might carry my colleagues with me in agreeing that "observation" in effect would include "inspection". Indeed, when I had earlier discussed this matter with my two colleagues, I was left with the impression that the Chairman agreed with me. Although the Polish Ambassador argued that the use of the word "inspection" in the context of "observation" in the instructions might create difficulties, I thought that unanimous agreement had been reached that, even though the word "inspection" was not used, the mobile teams could, in fact, carry out inspection when necessary. The method whereby this could be achieved would be best determined after studying the various activities which the mobile teams would undertake in their spheres of action.

10. I had hoped that although we would not include the word "inspection" in any definition of "observation", we would, by our examples of "observation" in effect expect our teams to carry out inspection.

11. When the Secretary-General circulated his paper I felt that his reference to our observation was too restrictive. I suggested the term "observation" should be drafted to cover reconnaissance, examination, and watching. Furthermore, I suggested that it should be made clear that the examples of observation listed on page 7 of the attached paper were illustrative only and not restrictive. In the course of our discussion it became obvious that the Chairman was no longer prepared to accept my view. In his opinion, the text as drafted by him would provide the Commission with all the powers needed at this stage and would give ample opportunity to the Commission to collect evidence to seek further authority if it should be considered necessary.

12. I accepted the Secretary-General's understanding of "observation" on the condition that, if experience proved that it was not broad enough to ensure effective and equal control and supervision in both the North and the South, steps would be taken to broaden it. As I see it, supervision and control in the South is relatively easy as long as the ports and airfields are covered by fixed teams. The situation in the North is more difficult and it is in this area that a narrow interpretation of the responsibilities of the Commission's teams may make the supervision and control less effective. Unless there is effective control in the North, it is difficult for the Commission to satisfy itself that the degree of control is equal in the two parts of the country.

FIRST INTERIM REPORT (AUGUST 11 TO DECEMBER 10, 1954)

I attach two copies of the report.³³

2. The report as it stands bears every sign of having been put together hurriedly and of being the result of a series of compromises describing the record of the parties in the implementation of the Agreement.

3. The decision to publish a report covering a four months rather than a five months period was prompted by the receipt of General Giap's memorandum. Within about a week the Secretariat produced a very rough first draft which the Commission took to Saigon on December 15. Saigon schedule happened to be heavier than expected and there was little time to consider the draft report. On its return to HANOI, with an extremely heavy agenda to clear up, in the week before Christmas and before the departure on leave of two of the Commissioners, there was really no time for as careful, detailed, considered revision of the report as we would have liked.

4. As to compromise formulae, they can be found throughout the report: for instance, paragraph 90 concerning Tra Ly had to be worked out in the light of Polish objections to criticism of the D.R. attitude and of Indian increasing unwillingness to admit that something more than a narrow interpretation of instructions might be involved; similarly, in the conclusion chapter, paragraphs 121 and 122 had to be carefully balanced both as to length and emphasis.

5. Throughout the discussion we found an inclination on the part of the Chairman to present what we considered to be an unwarranted optimistic picture of the situation, particularly in so far as Chapter VI, Control of the Introduction of War Matériel, was concerned. The Polish Representative's position was closer to our own. He was not prepared to leave himself open to criticism should it be established later that since August, either one or both parties had introduced personnel or equipment. I may add, that on the whole, while the Polish Delegation, on occasions, suggested amendments which would have been unfair to the French Union, they have not been obstructive, they have not unduly pressed their points and they have readily enough agreed to more balanced and objective revisions.

6. The Interim Report will be forwarded to the Co-Chairmen by Mr. Desai as Secretary General under a covering letter which we have not yet seen. It occurs to us that you may wish to take up with the Foreign Office the question of the early release of this document. The matter will no doubt be discussed as suggested by the Commission between the Co-Chairmen but if the Polish attitude here provides any indication, it would seem reasonable to assume that Mr. Molotov may be prepared to agree to an early publication.

7. On the question of style, I am bound to report that, in spite of numerous discreet and delicately presented suggestions for possible improvements, the Chair-

Hanoi, December 31, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL

INDIAN AND POLISH ATTITUDES

December 30 was on the whole a fairly successful day and the discussions in the Commission had, I think, particular significance.

2. The Commission dealt first with the transfer of Gia Lam Airport on January 1. The Chairman of a team of air advisers reported that under the arrangements foreseen, the airport would be reduced to the level of a fair-weather field. The Acting Chairman took the position that the Commission might have to accept such an arrangement in the hope that the situation could be improved gradually. The Polish Representative thought that the delay might not be very long.

3. I pointed out that without an airfield operating at the necessary level of efficiency the Commission, particularly during the next few months, might not be in a position to ensure the maintenance of some of its fixed teams, to send a mobile team to undertake an urgent inquiry or to maintain adequate communications with other parts of Indo-China or with the outside world. For these reasons, I felt that the Commission could not agree to even a temporary lowering of standards at the airfield. The parties had to be told in no uncertain terms that it was their duty to meet the vital requirements of the Commission. My Indian colleague shifted his position and agreed with me that a strong appeal had to be made to both parties. The Pole had to accept this line.

4. Later in the day, the Commission discussed an interesting case. The French claim that on December 15 four French prisoners of war escaped from a camp near Vinh where 80 French prisoners are being detained. The four Frenchmen in question took refuge in the Church compound at Vinh and the local priests submitted a petition on their behalf to the local team. Unfortunately, the team was away on a patrol and the petition was left with a Polish official. The next day, Viet troops surrounded the Church and recovered the prisoners. One priest managed to hide, and later to tell the story to the French Liaison Mission in Hanoi before reaching Haiphong.

5. At first, the Acting Chairman suggested that the complaint should merely be referred to the D.R. Liaison Mission for comments. I pointed out that a very serious allegation had been made and that the matter should be investigated forthwith through a mobile element drawn from the fixed team at Vinh. The Acting Chairman readily agreed and joined me in overcoming Polish attempts at delay. Our Polish colleague suggested that detailed instructions had to be drafted by the Committee on Freedoms, that the team should be instructed to prepare first a report on what it knew about the case. The Indian and I were firm and a telegram was sent to team instructing it to undertake the investigation immediately. The Indian Delegation appeared to consider that, once more, the Poles were giving signs of taking a very partial position.

6. In the course of the discussion both the Indian and I had been very careful not to refer to the allegation that the original petition had been referred to a Polish official at the fixed team location. I had assumed myself that if an inquiry could be undertaken the facts would be brought out unavoidably. The Polish Representative himself raised the point and mentioned that disturbing statements concerning the members of certain delegations had been made and that they would have to be investigated.

7. The Commission then considered a French request that a mobile team be sent to the Ba Lang area where according to the National Vietnamese Government 10,000 persons were assembled in the Cathedral compound. The item had been placed on the agenda for December 30 but in spite of this, the Polish Deputy Secretary General in charge of the Petitions Section had written to the D.R. Liaison Mission inviting their comments. I inquired as to the propriety of this action and the Indian Acting Chairman apologized on behalf of the Secretariat General. While similar action had been taken in one or two cases, it was not in line with settled policy. In fact, it was obvious that such a letter anticipated the outcome of the Commission's discussion and, in effect, gave one day's notice to the D.R. authorities about a possible investigation by a mobile team. This was all the more unnecessary as it seems that similar notice could have been conveyed informally.

8. The purpose of the Polish manoeuvre became obvious in the course of the discussion. The Polish Representative argued that as the letter had already been sent it might be sufficient to invite D.R. comments. When we opposed this very firmly, we were given the usual series of objections: instructions had to be drafted in detail, the Committee on Freedoms had to study the report of the mobile team which had recently conducted an investigation in the area. The Acting Chairman who, two months ago had hesitated so long before agreeing that a team should be sent to Phat Diem came out strongly with the view that the only way to find out whether there was a concentration at Ba Lang was to send a team and that it had to be sent quickly.

9. It may well be that our team will not discover a prisoner of war camp near Vinh or that there is no large concentration of refugees at Ba Lang. It is significant that due to an apparent change in the Indian attitude, the Commission can now, on occasions, make decisions quickly. The Polish attempts at obstruction are becoming more and more obvious and the partial attitude of some Polish officials in the Secretariat and on the teams is so glaring that it may not be without having some effect on the Indian Delegation.

10. I am not so concerned with Polish moves which can now be predicted quite easily in most cases, as with the Indian attitude. The Indian Alternate is not a very politically articulate officer and operating under a strong Chairman he has always displayed great reluctance in the absence of his chief about making any decisions which the Poles might not accept. It is, therefore, in my view, quite significant that he has now moved to the point where he takes readily quite a strong position and that he will change his initial line and support our own proposals for quick and energetic action. When I had doubts as to the Indian attitude, in the first few months, I was cautious to point out that my impressions were tentative and that an evolution was possible. I feel that such an evolution may have taken place but similar caution against optimism is undoubtedly required. The Indian Delegation may have shifted somewhat closer to us but they are not committed yet and great care will be required to secure their support on the important issues which have yet to be dealt with.

11. I may add that in anticipating Polish moves and endeavouring to enlist Indian support, careful staff work is required. With additional personnel, I feel that for the first time we have been able to attend Commission meetings with adequate briefs and to some extent to take the initiative. The Pole no longer has control of the agenda as he seemed to at one time. Furthermore, with adequate staff we can brief the members of the mobile teams before they leave and obtain from them on their return valuable material for subsequent Commission discussion. The investment in personnel, I think, may already be bringing dividends.

Phnom Penh, October 27, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL

A REVIEW OF THE WORK OF THE INTERNATIONAL SUPERVISORY COMMISSION
FOR CAMBODIA FROM ITS INCEPTION UNTIL 20 OCTOBER 1954

Now that the Commission has entered a more static phase of its existence, I think it may be helpful to the Department if I attempt a summary of its activities up to the final evacuation of Vietnamese troops on October 18 and the consequent dissolution of the Joint Commission on October 20, 1954. It is not my intention to give a play-by-play account of those activities but to describe in broad outline the difficulties and achievements of the Commission during the period in question. My thought is that such a report may constitute a useful résumé of this period for those officers in the Department who are particularly concerned with Indo-China. It will also provide a background against which to assess the further tasks of the Commission and their chances of successful completion.

The Early Phases: 11 August to 5 September

2. Not much was sent to Ottawa during this first month as very little of the work of the Commission was put on record, although it was during that period that the ground-work was done. As you know, there had to be a good deal of improvisation in those early days, and there was neither personnel nor machinery for the preparation of reports. For the Canadians, Brigadier, now Major-General, Morton, and later Mr. T.F.G. Fletcher did an excellent job of work in getting the Canadian Delegation housed, fed and working. The Commission held its inaugural meeting on 11 August and in its first few sessions adopted rules of procedure, made itself known to the Cambodian authorities, set up a central headquarters, decided on the sites for fixed and mobile teams, settled the order of priority for sending these teams out, drew up standing orders for them, and established liaison with the Joint Commission which had started its work at Svay Rieng on 20 August.

Later Phase: 7 September to 22 October

3. It was not until the 11th meeting of the International Commission, held on 7 September 1954, that the permanent Chairman, Mr. G. Parthasarathi, and the Polish Commissioner, Mr. Wiktor Grosz, took up their appointments. On 5 September, Mr. R. Duder, replaced Mr. Fletcher and remained head of the Canadian Delegation until the arrival of Mr. R.M. Macdonnell on 14 October.

4. The Commission, having paid official calls on the King and his chief ministers, at once got down to the business of supervising the release of prisoners-of-war and civilian internees. This task was tackled at several meetings of the Commission and at further meetings between it and the Joint Commission. These latter meetings took place at Banam, half-way between Phnom Penh, where the International Commission had its headquarters, and Svay Rieng, where the Joint Commission had theirs. I think it fair to say that the International Commission was able to expedite matters by resolving differences between the Royal Cambodian Delegation on the one side, and the Delegation of the Vietnamese Military Units and Khmer Resistance Forces on the other, and by exerting tactful pressure on both sides to get on with the business in hand.

5. The first release actually took place at Suong on 11 September and the Commissioners were present to see that everything was properly done. At later releases, the Commission was represented by the fixed or mobile team of the district concerned, the Commissioners presiding over the final release at Kompong Cham on 23 September when some 337 civilian internees were set free. On the whole, the operation went smoothly and last-minute differences of opinion were settled by the Commission on the spot. A press release on the liberation of prisoners-of-war and civilian internees was later issued by the Commission. Nothing now remains of this phase of the Commission's work except a few complaints from both sides that not all prisoner-of-war and not all civilian internees had been released. These complaints are being investigated.

Withdrawal of Foreign Armed Forces and Foreign Military Personnel

6. The withdrawal of French military personnel had been largely carried out before the Commission had begun its activities. Apart from the French military mission and a number of French military and naval instructors, there are now no French forces in Cambodia. The main problem in this field concerned the Vietnamese Military Units. In a series of meetings with the Joint Commission, the International Commission was able to iron out differences between the Royal Cambodian Army Delegation and the other side. Finally a workable plan was achieved which called for the aid of 1 French LCT and 2 LCMs. This plan was put into operation on 12 October when approximately 500 Vietnamese troops were evacuated down the Mekong River from Neak Luong to South Vietnam. On 15 October a further group of 834 and on 18 October a final group of 1,050 were withdrawn. With each group the International Commission sent a team of its officers who remained on board the transports up to the Cambodian border. The Commissioners were present at each evacuation and their presence was clearly welcome to both sides. I think it was also useful in preventing any last-minute hitches since each side could appeal to the Commission and, by accepting the Commission's decision, save face — an important consideration in the Far East.

7. The total number involved in the withdrawal is suspiciously small. The Royal Cambodian Government has expressed to the International Commission its grave concern over this and its intention of investigating on its own to establish whether there are armed Vietnamese and Khmer Resistance Forces still in the Kingdom. I think it more than likely that there have been clandestine withdrawals of Vietnamese troops and of Cambodian resistants together with their arms and supplies. Nevertheless, the Cambodian Government cannot but welcome the clearing of its territory, in spite of its justifiable fear that some of the men secretly withdrawn may return to sow discontent and dissension.

Fixed and Mobile Teams

8. These tripartite teams have been stationed at strategic centres throughout the country. There are 5 fixed teams with 6 officers each at Svay Rieng, Kampot, Kompong Cham, Kratie and Phnom Penh. There are three mobile teams, two at Battambang, one at Kompong Chhnang and a fourth which is to be sent, against the Canadian Delegation's judgment, to Stung Treng early in November. The teams are visited at regular intervals by a liaison mission from the International Commission's Headquarters and the team-members occasionally come to Phnom Penh. In these ways, the International Commission has been kept informed of what goes on in the provinces. Until the dissolution of the Joint Commission on 20 October, the teams were in liaison with the Joint Groups which represented that Commission in various places throughout the country. They supervised in some places the liberation of prisoners-of-war and civilian internees, and the withdrawal of Vietnamese Military Units from the districts where they operate. They have undertaken on-the-spot investigations at the request of the Commission and serve generally as the eyes and ears of the Commission throughout Cambodia.

Relations Between the International Commission and the Royal Government

9. Relations between the Cambodian Government and the Commission have been correct but not exactly cordial. It has to be remembered that Cambodia has not been independent for very long and its Government is understandably somewhat touchy about its new-found dignity. Moreover, they are, according to my information, extremely suspicious of the Poles and it must, I fear, be admitted that the Polish Commissioner has gone out of his way to be critical of them and ostentatiously friendly to the Vietnamese and Khmer Resistants. I have reported in earlier communications the difficulties which arose between the Government and the Commission over certain official communiqués, both theirs and ours, and the reasonably satisfactory solution of these differences. The Cambodian Government felt the International Commission was more or less thrust upon them at Geneva. They believed they could handle the aftermath of war without assistance. Their resentful attitude towards the rumoured claims of the Commission to supervise the elections is but one example of their somewhat stiffnecked attitude. I should, however, add that the personal relations of the Canadian Delegation with the various ministers have always been friendly and, as far as I can judge, not merely as a result of the innate politeness of the Cambodians who are, by and large, a charming and friendly race.

10. In fairness, it should also be said that the ministers have nearly always answered the Commission's requests for information promptly and fully. This is particularly true of the request which the Commission made to the Minister of National Defence concerning the planned extension of the armed forces under Articles 7 and 13 (c) of the Geneva Agreement.³⁴ The Government have also made it possible for our teams in the field to move freely and to make whatever enquiries they have thought fit. I have made several attempts to get them to see more of the Commission in Phnom Penh on an informal basis but so far with no great success. I should add that the Colombo Conference and the quadripartite conference in Paris have taken many of their top men and resulted in a great overburdening of those ministers who remained in the capital. Some ministers have as many as three or four portfolios.

Relations with the Vietnamese Military Units and Khmer Resistance Forces

11. Relations with the Vietnamese leaders and the leaders of the Khmer Resistance Forces have been largely confined to the meetings at Banam between the Joint Commission and the International Commission. All these Communists have been excessively polite and deferential, not to say flattering. They have gone out of their way to visit the Commissioners privately, both individually and as a trio; I have reported most of these encounters as they took place. On 8 October, the Commissioners visited the Vietnamese High Command in their jungle headquarters beyond Suong and were received with great ceremony, treated to several courses of speeches and many more of Vietnamese foods. We were prayed for, which no doubt we needed, by the local bonzes and, on leaving, presented with gifts by the Commander-in-Chief. When the Joint Commission ended its work on 20 October, the Vietnamese co-Chairman, Colonel Nguyen Thanh Son, gave a banquet in our honour in Phnom Penh, in the course of which our role as "consolidators of peace" was the subject of many fulsome speeches and innumerable toasts.

Cambodian Personalities

12. In earlier reports, I made brief mention of the principal ministers of the Royal Government. It may now be useful to revise those first estimates and add sketches of some of the other men with whom the Commission has had dealings:

(a) The President of the Council of Ministers, H.E. Penn Nouth. M. Penn Nouth is a devoted patriot and as wily as a fox. He is extremely powerful and few decisions are taken by the various ministers without his knowledge and approval. He strikes one as highly nervous and easily roused. On such occasions his voice tends to become high and shrill and his uncommonly long fingers scratch the back of his uncommonly long neck with alarming frequency. The antagonism between him and the Polish Commissioner has been barely concealed during our few meetings. He has been most affable to the Canadians. He may become a leading man in the Democratic Party when the electoral campaign opens.

(b) The Minister for External Affairs, H.E. Tep Phan. M. Tep Phan is a charming and affable little man, very much under the thumb of Penn Nouth. He is less of a Minister than a superior civil servant, hardworking and honest, within the limits of local custom which is rather laxer than Canadian. You will remember that he was David to Mr. Molotov's Goliath in the closing hours of the Geneva Conference. Our dealings with him have been cordial but not frequent enough.

(c) The Minister of National Defence, H.E. Colonel Ngo-Hou. Colonel Ngo-Hou is also Chief of the General Staff and Minister of Public Health. He is a medical doctor by profession and, so it is said, a collector of perquisites by nature. I am told that he is closely allied to the King's mother who is a sinister influence and the foremost intriguer and grafter in the Kingdom. Colonel Ngo-Hou has been quite ready to provide the Commission with information on the planned extension of Cambodia's armed forces. One of his weaknesses, however, is the inability to delegate authority. I have heard that he is not loyal to anyone except himself. On the other hand, he is energetic and some of the foreigners here have found him helpful.

(d) Colonel Lon Nol. Colonel Lon Nol was the head of the Royal Cambodian Delegation to the Joint Commission. He has now returned to his post as Governor of the Province of Battambang and — an unusual combination for Cambodia — Commander-in-Chief of the troops there. In politics he is a leading figure in the Party of National Reconstruction but tells me that he has not yet decided whether to run for election next year. Like the Ministers described above, he speaks fluent French. He is, for a Cambodian, a large man with the broad flat face and thick lips of the race. In my opinion, he is the finest public man we have met. Open and honest, Lon Nol strikes me as one of the best hopes of this country. He has the entire confidence of the King who, by all accounts, can do with a few really reliable men around him. We hope to keep in touch with him through our teams in Battambang.

Personalities of the International Commission

13. The Chairman of the International Commission, Mr. G. Parthasarathi, has great patience, considerable acumen and undoubted charm. Like many of his compatriots, he moves at a pace which is as far removed as possible from that of the go-getter. He believes strongly in the healing influence of time and occasionally time fails to perform the curative function which he had allotted to it. As a chairman, he is not always firm enough, with the result that matters are sometimes postponed for no very cogent reason. He has, however, a good mind and is a very civilized person with great qualities of human warmth and sympathy. By profession he is a journalist. His father, now dead, was Minister of National Defence, and Mr. Parthasarathi himself is said to be a protégé of Mr. Krishna Menon and favourably known to Mr. Nehru, whose visit to Phnom Penh on Sunday, 31 October, he is busily preparing. His relations with the Canadian Delegation could hardly be better. At first he was a little uncertain of himself, since this is his first venture in the field of diplomacy, but he has steadily gained confidence and I think he may well become a prominent member of the Indian diplomatic service.

14. Major-General Sarda Nand Singh, the Indian Alternate Delegate, is a handsome and dashing soldier with a great sense of fun. He was formerly Military Secretary at the time when the Chairman's father was Minister of National Defence and Mr. Parthasarathi leans heavily on him. He is, unfortunately, very keen to get back to India and this detracts from his application to the tasks in hand. A most likeable man, Major-General Singh has at all times shown the greatest friendliness to the Canadians.

15. The Polish Commissioner, Mr. Wiktor Grosz, is an ardent and voluble Communist who has never attempted to be strictly neutral. He has gone out of his way to show his comradeship with the Vietnamese Military Units and Khmer Resistance Forces and has frequently needled the Cambodian Government. It has sometimes taken all the persuasive power of the Chairman and the Canadian Commissioner to prevent him from committing acts which, in their opinion, might have completely alienated the Government. Mr. Grosz is affable and approachable, and has been an excellent companion on the various journeys of the Commission. He is an admirable linguist and a shrewd negotiator. His relations with the Canadian Delegation have been cordial within the limits inseparable from the relationship between an avowed Communist and representatives of Canadian democracy. Possessed of unusual mental and physical energy, he has surrounded himself with a large team and shows no sign of wanting to reduce the Commission's numbers. It is a mystery to us, and to the Cambodians, what all his minions find to do but it seems clear that they intend to keep a close watch on the activities of the Cambodian Government, both in the capital and in the provinces. Mr. Grosz was the senior "political" general of the Polish Army, a former ambassador to Czechoslovakia and in, I think, 1945 Head of the Polish Military Mission to the United Kingdom. It seems at first sight somewhat puzzling that so experienced and senior a man should have been sent to the least complex and most peaceful of the three states of Indo-China. The answer to the puzzle may well be that in Cambodia the Communists lost and had to leave the country, whereas in VietNam their success was great. To help as far as possible to redress the balance and to prepare the way for future Communist infiltrations and possible eventual victorious return, an able and senior Communist with great experience in the Communist underground was chosen as Polish Commissioner. This interpretation may link up with the quite unnecessarily large number of Poles who are now in Cambodia and to whom fresh arrivals are added every week. On some days in my hotel there are as many Poles in the dining room as there are Canadians in the whole of Cambodia. It should never be forgotten that the Communists are trained to take the long view, no matter what the immediate task in hand may be. We, on the other hand, have come here to do a limited and fairly clearly defined job of work and then to return to our country. Left to itself with Laos and VietNam as neighbours, this little kingdom will be in no enviable position over the next ten or fifteen years. Although it is perhaps neither relevant to this despatch nor to the task of the Canadian Delegation, I venture to hope that we are giving some thought in the Department to ways and means of helping the Cambodians to remain anti-Communist. As an independent country Cambodia is a newcomer to the international scene and will both need friends and be grateful to them.

Relations with the Diplomatic Corps

16. The Canadian Delegation has been in friendly contact with the newly-arrived American Ambassador, Mr. McClintock, and the newly-arrived British Ambassador, Mr. Heppel, as well as with the Thai and Japanese Ministers. We have not pushed these contacts very far as yet in view of our instructions and the neutral nature of the Commission. With the French High Commissioner, Mr. Gorce, we have had formal contact which he has not attempted to pursue. At the time of the withdrawal of the Vietnamese Military Units, we saw something of Colonel Des Essars, head of the French Military Mission, with whom our dealings were friendly and fruitful.

The Canadian Delegation

17. The Canadian Delegation now has a headquarters in which all members of the headquarters staff work. Living accommodation is in hotels. Health has been, on the whole, good. There have been no serious problems and the team is working well.

The Task Ahead

18. The International Commission has now entered a more static phase of its operations. With the exception of keeping a watch on the entry of war material in the light of the Cambodian Declaration on this matter, dealing with petitions and complaints and considering the problems of integration and the elections, the Commission has carried out according to schedule the main tasks set forth in the Geneva Agreement. The Canadian Delegation has already begun to consider possible reductions of the strength of the Delegation. Unfortunately, the Polish Delegation has been increasing steadily and insisting on putting out more teams. We are studying the implications of this development, which strikes us as ill-timed and likely to arouse the suspicion and anger of the Cambodian Government. The Chairman of the Commission is also worried about this matter.

19. It is, I think, fair to say that the International Commission has dealt on the whole successfully with the problems that faced it from its arrival until the dissolution of the Joint Commission on 20 October. It has exercised a moderating and stabilizing influence on the post-hostilities period. There is no reason to doubt that it will continue to exert this influence during the remainder of its sojourn in the Kingdom of Cambodia.

PROGRESS REPORT FOR WEEK 6-11 NOVEMBER

1. The Commissioners and Advisers spent weekend at Kep visiting fixed team at Kampot and provincial authorities. Useful private talks between Chairman and Polish Ambassador revealed divergence of views on reduction in strength of Commission personnel, Grosz contending that much work remains to be done. Chairman wants Canadian delegation to present factual case for reduction and we are turning our attention to this.

2. The 3 days Festival of the Waters brought normal business to a standstill in Phnom Penh. Visitors included Woodsworth, Ottawa Citizen.

3. Chairman and 3 Deputy Secretaries-General left November 12 for Hanoi to attend first coordination meeting of 3 Commissions.

4. The planned investigation in the Province of Svay Rieng, referred to in paragraph 4 of my telegram under reference, has been shelved. At a private meeting of the Commissioners on 10 November the Polish Commissioner said he had been misunderstood and had not agreed to such an investigation.

5. An investigation by the fixed team at Phnom Penh into the alleged presence of Vietnamese troops in Kompong-Speu area was undertaken in response to a letter on this matter from the Foreign Ministry. It turned out that the incident which was the subject of the complaint had taken place on 8 October, the Vietnamese concerned had been withdrawn under the evacuation scheme and no further trouble has been reported. In other words, events had long since overtaken the circumstances reported in the Ministry's complaint and their information from the area concerned was out of date.

6. Reports coming from Canadian team members suggest that the Indians are beginning to lose their composure in dealing with Poles. This situation has been brought about by the attitude of the Poles who apparently delight in raising objections at every opportunity and make little effort to cooperate. For example, they will wrangle for hours over 1 word in the teams weekly report. 2 recent reports from Battambang, each of less than 2 pages and very general in nature, required 5 hours discussion before the Poles would agree to sign them. Flare ups between the Indian team leaders and the Poles have occurred during the last 2 weeks at Kampot, Kratie, Battambang and Kompong Chhnang. The Polish Commissioner implied this week that the Canadians and Indians on various teams were refusing to carry out necessary and proper tasks suggested by their Polish colleagues.

7. At its 23rd meeting on 11 November the Commission considered letters from the Foreign Minister:

(a) Complaining of exactions by the Vietnamese Hoa-Hao sect in the province of Takeo.

(b) Alleging that civilian internees, provincial guards and prisoners-of-war were still held in custody by the Vietnamese military units (i.e. the Viet Minh).

The Minister asked the Commission to use its powers and prerogatives to solve these questions. It is not easy to see just how the Commission can influence these unsolved problems which now concern territories and authorities outside Cambodia and, in some cases, have no perceptible relation to the Geneva Agreement. The Foreign Minister is showing a regrettable desire to unload such problems on the Commission, usually by means of vague letters which give us insufficient information.

PROGRESS REPORT FOR WEEK 13-19 NOVEMBER

1. Chairman returned on 16 November from co-ordination meeting of the three international secretariats at Hanoi. Reports on this will follow. Chairman's experience at Hanoi and further conversations with Polish Commissioner have convinced Parthasarathi that it is now most unlikely that the Poles will agree even to consider reduction. He has asked us therefore not to submit our plan to reduce numbers (see para 1 of our telegram under reference). On the contrary, Poles are preparing to press for sending out of more teams, notably to Snoul and Khum Krek, and taking line that the Commission has more, not less work to do. In conversation with us Chairman appeared to be more convinced than he was when we last had a discussion on the subject that Commissioners would have to keep an eye on the elections in order to ensure democratic liberties of all citizens. He proposes to continue efforts to win confidence of government with aim of persuading them of benefits to them of having Commission's agreement that the elections were properly conducted. Would appreciate your views on the election issue.

2. These various considerations place the future of the Commission in a new but not necessarily clearer light. I think we must reconcile ourselves to staying here indefinitely and at about the same strength. There may even have to be an increase if pressure increases. Polish Commissioner has already said to Chairman that he sees no reason why Canadians should not send for more officers. Much will depend on firmness of Chairman's support of our view. More Poles have arrived and I anticipate a struggle to hold them back from interfering unjustifiably in the internal affairs of Cambodia. There are already signs of this from the teams. For example, in Battambang they have tried to persuade the team to investigate all the people in the local prison to see whether they have been excluded from the benefits of the Geneva Agreement. In Kompong Cham they are asking for copies of the electoral roll. There have been a few reports of Polish members of teams trying to contact local intellectuals such as school teachers and officials. New Polish arrivals are said to be more militant Communists than we have hitherto (group corrupt). Both Chairman and Grosz saw Ho Chi Minh and Niap (Giap as decyphered) at Hanoi.

3. Some French troops and officers are withdrawing from Laos through Cambodia and Commission is keeping an eye on this movement.

4. Liaison team visited Kompong Cham and Svay Rieng this week. Next week it goes to Kampot, Kompong, Chhnang and Battambang.

5. Commissioners and advisers visited Battambang on 18 November and had useful talks with Governor Lon Nol (Mon Nol as decyphered) and the teams. Military Committee met today, 19 November. At this meeting Colonel Babicz, the Polish military adviser, stressed the need of checking the movement of all war material from South Vietnam to Laos along the road which passes through Snoul, Kratie and Stung Treng. He maintains that if the International Commission teams do not check it and control its movement, then there is nothing to prevent much of it being retained in Cambodia. This is considered by military adviser to be a subterfuge to have more teams stationed along the Snoul-Stung Treng road, a move which as we have noted in paragraph 1 above the Poles have been trying to have approved. The matter was referred to the Commissioners by the Military Advisers Committee and may be brought up at the Commission's meeting on 29 November.

6. Woodsworth left on 16 November. Reuters representative in Indo-China, Smith has asked to see us this week.

7. Macdonnell leaves 20 November. Prime Minister giving a dinner in his honour this evening, 19 November.

PROGRESS REPORT FOR WEEK 19-26 NOVEMBER

1. At its meeting on 19 November Commission considered what to do about prisoners-of-war allegedly held by both sides. General Giap had promised Chairman to look into lists furnished by Cambodian Government which we will send him and to reply through Vietnam Commission. We shall take up with government question of non-release of some 400 prisoners stated by Vietnamese to be still held in Cambodia. Complaints and petitions were also discussed and International Secretariat directed to classify these more carefully. The government had written to say that the Commission should neither correspond with nor contact in any way Son Ngoc Thanh. The Commission felt that since he was now a citizen we could not accept the view that he had no right to contact us or that we had no right to meet him. Commission also heard a report on 28 Cambodian prisoners-of-war handed over by the French to the local authorities at Svay Rieng. They are now in Phnom Penh and will be liberated shortly. Ministry of Justice has asked Commission to be present at liberation.

2. The Commissioners have held several informal meetings to seek agreement on our future tasks after which we intend to ask the government to meet us informally to discuss these tasks. The atmosphere was friendly and there seemed to be a real desire on Grosz's part to reach unanimity. Both he and Chairman went a long way to meet me on the question of elections. At tomorrow's meeting Chairman will place on record a paper embodying our agreement. Its main points are:

(a) Commission considers Articles 1 to 5 and Article 8 as carried out. Residual claims under Article 8 to be settled by direct contact between governments of Cambodia and Democratic Republic with Commission's help.

(b) Commission not satisfied that Article 6 has been fully carried out by government and is disturbed by reports that some former members of the Khmer resistance forces have been arrested or detained.

(c) Commission must now make effort to persuade and convince government that cooperation with the International Commission in these common tasks will not only enable us to discharge successfully our responsibilities but also contribute to a lasting political settlement in Cambodia.

(d) Elections (group corrupt) agreement is given here verbatim. I had to fight hard for it and hope that it will receive your approval. In discussions with the government special stress must be laid on the fact that the International Commission cannot remain indifferent to the parliamentary elections in Cambodia. In terms of Article 6 of the agreement, the declaration of the Royal Government at Geneva on the subject of elections and point 3 of the 9 powers declaration, the International Commission has a responsibility to make sure that all citizens participate in the coming elections in conditions of respect for democratic freedoms as guaranteed by the constitution of Cambodia. The International Commission does not contemplate supervising the elections which it agrees are to be held according to the laws and regulations of the country. Its sole concern is to assist the government in fulfilling the obligations which it undertook at Geneva.

3. Military Advisers Committee: At meetings held 23 and 24 November the Polish military adviser, Col. Babicz, was argumentative, intransigent, and rude, he argued over every minor point, making an issue of almost every word that went into instructions for the teams. The 2 meetings lasted 5 hours and settled only minor points. Babicz requested positioning of a team at Snoul. Canadian member refused to agree. He was given some support by the Indian and a decision was postponed. Indian General took very great exception to a false accusation by Babicz that he had issued instructions to (all?) of the teams without approval from the Canadian and Polish members. Accusation repeated by the Polish Commissioner to the Chairman at another meeting. Indian claimed his integrity was being put in doubt. After much hedging Babicz agreed to ask his Commissioner to apologize to the Chairman. The apology has not yet been made. Meeting on 26th was friendlier and more was accomplished. At this meeting Babicz tried to have Indian and Canadian members agree that Cambodian Government should be made to permit the teams to go wherever they wished without prior notice. The Canadian member argued that it was only common courtesy to ask the government for permission to visit any military installation and thus hope for full cooperation rather than invite antagonism. The Pole finally agreed.

4. Commission visited Kratie and Stung Treng by plane on 25 November and briefed teams in these isolated spots. Canadian and Indian team members supported our view that there is no real case for sending a fresh team to Snoul. Commission warmly welcomed at both places by leading dignitaries who have done their best to make teams comfortable and have cooperated with them fully.

5. In view of recent increase of Polish pressure at all levels and particularly in Military Advisers Committee, and of consequent need to revise our estimate of the possibility of reducing both duration and size of Commission I should like to request retention of General Snow's services. Indian Generals departure appears now to have been indefinitely postponed. I have written at some length on these problems in despatch 46 of November 22† but this will not reach you before a decision has been taken on General Snow's employment here.

PROGRESS REPORT

1. Owing to change of plane schedule this report covers period 27 November to 2 December only. Commission met on 27 November and commissioners have had several informal meetings. Prime Minister's illness has somewhat delayed our work since we are all agreed that Foreign Minister is not effective except with Penn Nouth's backing.

2. At meeting on 27 November commission considered 2 letters from the government calling our attention to the discovery of small caches of arms and ammunition alleged to have been hidden by the Viet Minh and their resistance forces against their return. Unfortunately the government, as so often happens with their correspondence, did not give clear and adequate information. Nevertheless, it was agreed to instruct our fixed teams in the areas concerned to contact local authorities and obtain details of the official reports as to how the discoveries were made and whether there were any documents which could be transferred to the commission. Consideration was also given to the problem of the 70 Viet Nameese born in Cambodia still held in Suong and the 30 held in Kompong Chhnang. We are still awaiting the government's decision which has been delayed by Prime Minister's illness. A list of outstanding matters, compiled by the alternate delegate for India, was handed to the commissioners who agreed that the chairman should take them up with the Foreign Minister. This the chairman did later in the week but without much success. Tep Phan promised to do his best but this, as experience has taught us, is none too good. The meeting approved a letter to the government calling attention to disturbing reports of arrests of ex-Khmer resistance people and asking for full information on what the government had done and planned to do to implement article 6.

3. Informal meetings were not very fruitful this week. Polish Commissioner thought commission should seek more publicity. He also said he was about to produce for us a suggested plan of future work. My attempts to get an agreed policy on public information led nowhere. Chairman has been much occupied with work as Secretary-General Grosz very worried about situation in Europe to which he kept switching the discussion.

4. King is making tour of provinces and is today at Kep Whither, Malcolm MacDonald has gone to see him. I have telegraphed you separately on likely next moves in the election question (telegram 32 of 1 December).†

5. The liaison team visited the fixed team at Kampot and the mobile team at Kompong Chhnang and Battambang during the period under review. The mobile team at Battambang flew into Pailin, a town near the Thailand border, which has been cut off from the rest of the province since early 1954.

6. Military Adviser's Committee. At military Adviser's Committee meeting on 2 December General Sarda Nand Singh raised point that Polish Commissioner had again accused him falsely of issuing instructions without approval of Canadian and Polish members. He pointed out that at time of previous false accusation Colonel Babicz undertook to ask Polish Commissioner to apologize to Chairman stating matter was a misunderstanding but no such apology had been received. Babicz denied he gave any such undertaking. General Singh appealed to Canadian members who were able to state unequivocally that Babicz had indeed given the undertaking. Babicz then stated he would speak to Polish Commissioner again about the matter. Meeting proceeded but more than an hour was spent by Polish member on wording of 3 questions to be asked of 1 of the teams. Finally he recommended 1 question which in fact incorporated all 3 questions.

PROGRESS REPORT FOR WEEK 3-9 DECEMBER

1. This week has been relatively uneventful. Polish Commissioner was busy with visiting financial inspector and chairman with interim report on the Commission's work to India and with matters concerning India's recognition of Cambodia which I am told will be announced on December 13. One formal and several informal meetings were held.

2. Commissioners and alternates spent weekend in Battambang. I have reported separately on this visit (my despatch No. 65 of 7 December)† and sent you the press release describing it.

3. Malcolm MacDonald had long talks with King on 2 December. He told me he thought King deserved all support he could get from free nations. King and government expressed to MacDonald concern over numbers of Vietnamese allegedly still at large in Cambodia. In a press interview on 7 December MacDonald promised Great Britain would do all in its power to protect Cambodia's freedom which was essential for the free world.

4. At meeting on 3 December Chairman reported sending to Foreign Minister a fuller statement on outstanding cases before the Commission. (Paragraph 2 of telegram No. 34 refers). Minister undertook to arrange meeting at which Commission would go into these matters with Minister of National Security. Commission considered letter from government alleging some 4000 Vietnamese and Khmer resistance forces were still at large. We decided to order an investigation and at same time to point out to the government the circumstances which, in our view, were hindering the solution on the reintegration problem. I am puzzled by the slowness with which government tackles this mopping up process. They must know that we have no powers of enforcement and cannot expect our teams to act as armed patrols. It may be that they are passing these reports which are increasing in number on to the Commission in order to be able to document a case against the Vietminh for later use. In reply to another letter concerning a band of Khmer resistants in Battambang alleged to be carrying out propaganda in favour of Son Ngoc Minh and advocating division of Cambodia in way similar to division of Vietnam we agreed to tell the government that:

(a) Since the Khmer resistance forces had been officially disbanded by 22 August in terms of Article 5, the government had in our view the right to take such action against any law-breakers as the laws of the land permitted;

(b) The Commission could not object to political propaganda as long as it was confined to the realm of politics; and

(c) We had ordered our teams to investigate and report.

5. Commission also wrote Foreign Minister on general theme of reintegration. Following quotation gives essentials of our approach:

We quite realize that the existence of groups in Cambodia not yet reintegrated into the national community may well create serious problems of internal security. It is for that reason that the question of reintegration is perhaps the most pressing one now before the Commission. Like most questions it will not be solved without goodwill and goodwill is difficult to obtain where apprehension and fear may still remain as a legacy of the war so recently terminated. The Commission looks forward to discussing at an early opportunity with Your Excellency and other members of the Cabinet ways and means of encouraging former resistants to present themselves for reintegration into the national community.

6. Military Advisers Committee. At meeting on 9 December pattern of intransigence by Polish member, which has been developing lately, was emphasized. Meeting lasted 3 hours, over an hour of which was taken up with wording of draft instruction to one of the teams. In an attempt to make some headway General Singh suggested that one of the previous recommendations of Babicz be adopted but latter would not agree. Finally for no obvious reason Babicz agreed to original draft. He then raised question of accusations against General Singh by Polish commissioner stating that latter denies making any such accusations to the chairman. These accusations had been admitted on a previous occasion. In face of this bewildering contradiction General Singh has decided to drop the whole matter. This is admittedly an unhappy state of affairs but is certainly not calculated to bring the Indians closer to the Poles. Singh is one of India's youngest and most promising Generals.

7. Commissioners agreed privately to set up a political committee and this move will be given official approval at meeting on 10 December.

8. We have decided to send a report on Commission's activities to the co-chairmen of the Geneva Conference. By previous private arrangement with the Chairman I undertook this task when he suggested it at an informal meeting of the 3 Commissioners this week.

ELECTIONS IN CAMBODIA

During the course of the last few months there have been marked differences of opinion on the role, if any, that the International Supervisory Commission in Cambodia should play in the forthcoming general elections to be held in that country sometime in 1955. The Polish Commissioner is convinced that the Commission has a definite responsibility in this matter and to some extent at least his Indian colleague (the chairman) agrees with him. On the other hand, the Cambodian Government apparently holds the view strongly that general elections are of no concern to the Commission and that there is nothing in the Cease Fire Agreement which gives the Commission the right to intervene. The United States Government apparently shares the Cambodian view, and we understand that the United Kingdom to some extent also does. Our Commissioner has asked us for advice.

2. I should be grateful for your legal opinion on the following question: "To what extent, if any, should the International Commission concern itself with the 1955 general elections in Cambodia?"

3. There have already been a number of communications from our Commissioner in Phnom Penh on this subject and also one despatch from Hanoi. Copies of these are attached for your information.

4. The following Articles of the Agreement on the Cessation of Hostilities in Cambodia appear to be relevant to this question: Article 6, Article 11, and Article 13. In addition, there is the Unilateral Declaration of the Royal Government of Cambodia (which is embodied in Article 6) and Paragraph 3 of the Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference which was signed, inter alia, by the representative of Cambodia.

5. Our own preliminary view corresponds more or less to that expressed in Hanoi's Despatch No. 101 of October 13† (copy attached). In so far as the Agreement itself is concerned, the Commission is responsible for the control and supervision of the application of the provisions of the Agreement (Article 11). In the same vein (Article 13), the Commission "shall be responsible for supervising the execution by the parties of the provisions of the present Agreement. For this purpose it shall fulfil the functions of control, observation, inspection and investigation connected with the implementation of the provisions of the Agreement . . .". One of the provisions of the Agreement states (Article 6) that the situation of "these nationals" shall be decided in the light of the Declaration made by Cambodia at the Geneva Conference. The Declaration is then reproduced in full in Article 6. It reads, inter alia, that the Government of Cambodia declares itself resolved to guarantee "them" the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms for which the Constitution of the Kingdom provides. Further, the Government of Cambodia affirms that all Cambodian citizens may freely participate as electors or candidates in general elections by secret ballot, and that no reprisals shall be taken against "the said nationals".

6. It would appear that the Commissions' responsibility from a strictly legal point of view in so far as Article 6 is concerned is limited to "these nationals", their integration into the national community and their right to freely participate in general elections. At first sight "these nationals" could be interpreted as meaning the Khmer Resistance Forces and the troops of the Royal Khmer Army because Article 6 follows Article 5 (the first Article of Chapter III of the Agreement) and the only nationals mentioned in Article 5 are those quoted above. However, Article 6, after including the Cambodian Government's Declaration, then goes on to say that no reprisals shall be taken against "the said nationals". This would imply that "these nationals" referred to in Article 6 must mean only the Khmer Resistance Forces.

7. In summary, therefore, it would appear that legally the Commission has the right and responsibility to observe the general elections only in so far as they concern ex-members of the Khmer Resistance Forces and their families, and in this connection if the Cambodian Government is not fulfilling its obligations as set forth in Article 6, to take such further action as it deems necessary.

8. There do not appear to be any further Articles in the Agreement itself having a bearing on this question. However, Paragraph III of the Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference states, inter alia, that the Conference takes note of the Declaration made by the Government of Cambodia and its intention to adopt measures permitting all citizens to take their place in the national community and in particular by participating in the next general elections which, in conformity with the country's Constitution, will take place in 1955. The legal status of this Final Declaration in so far as it is of concern to the International Supervisory Commission is not clear, and I would appreciate your views on this to be incorporated in your reply to this memorandum. At first sight it would seem that the Final Declaration is of no particular concern to the Commission from the legal point of view but it is of course binding on all its signatories in so far as it contains matters of substance not already covered by the Agreements themselves.

9. I might add as a footnote to this memorandum that the International Commission in Cambodia appears to have come to some tentative agreement on this subject at the end of November which is phrased in the following manner:

"In discussions with the government special stress must be laid on the fact that the International Commission cannot remain indifferent to the parliamentary elections in Cambodia. In terms of Article 6 of the agreement, the declaration of the Royal Government at Geneva on the subject of elections and point 3 of the 9 powers declaration, the International Commission has a responsibility to make sure that all citizens participate in the coming elections in conditions of respect for democratic freedoms as guaranteed by the constitution of Cambodia. The International Commission does not contemplate supervising the elections which it agrees are to be held according to the laws and regulations of the country. Its sole concern is to assist the government in fulfilling the obligations which it undertook at Geneva."

PROGRESS REPORT FOR WEEK 10-16 DECEMBER

1. Commission has still not been able to get firm date from government for meeting to discuss outstanding problems. On 11 December, Chairman saw Foreign Minister and left with him a note verbale stating that the aims of the proposed meeting would be:

(a) To acquaint government with the Commission's views on implementation of provisions of agreement not yet fully carried out.

(b) To hear government's exposé of its policy concerning these provisions.

(c) To discuss frankly and freely any points of difference between government and Commission. Minister promised action but left on 15 December with King (who had returned from France on 14 December) for week's visit to Bangkok. This apparent reluctance or inability to meet us may be due to Cambodian lethargy, but unfortunately strengthens Polish recorded view that government is deliberately obstructive. Interview was quite cordial and Minister assured Chairman government was most anxious for good relations with Commission. I hope government is not protesting too much.

2. Two formal and several informal meetings held during week. At formal meeting, on 10 December, Commission considered recommendations of the co-ordination conference of the 3 secretariats-general (held at Hanoi in November). A paper is being prepared on the question of immunities and privileges for Commission personnel here. It was agreed that the report to the co-chairman of the Geneva Conference would be signed by all 3 Commissioners and the advice of the co-chairmen requested as to whether some parts could be made public. A proposal to set up a political advisers' committee was accepted and the Committee will shortly be functioning. Several petitions were considered and it became clear that Grosz and I were in fundamental disagreement on proper approach to these. Grosz takes position that any person condemned for political offences "since the beginning of hostilities in Cambodia" must ipso-facto benefit from the government's October 1954 amnesty. In my opinion this point of view involves Commission in raking up mixed (politic-criminal) cases long ago settled by French or Cambodian courts and comes close to unjustifiable interference in Cambodia's internal affairs. No decisions were taken since the chairman decided it was more tactful to withdraw the item for further consideration at an informal meeting. We also discussed letters from the Foreign Minister alleging hostile acts in various parts of Cambodia by the Hoa-Hao group, by former Khmer resistance forces and by Vietnamese troops who were allegedly not evacuated in October. Grosz went on record as saying that government was making these allegations for "its own or somebody else's use as political material against the International Commission". I went on record by saying that I was not convinced that this was necessarily so and that the government had every right to appeal to the Commission. Meeting also took up the question of sanctioning expenditure for the accommodation of Poles in a hotel, the Cambodian Government having allegedly refused to pay the bill for a group of the latest arrivals. I proposed that we should have this refusal in writing from the government and took the opportunity of asking my colleagues whether they contemplated further increases in personnel. Both said there would be no increase. The atmosphere at this meeting and at the following meeting was more strained than at any other meeting in the past. Informal meetings have however, not reflected this strain. It may be that Grosz by himself does not feel same constraint as seems to affect him at meetings when his praetorian guards surround him. At formal meetings lately he has read from a prepared brief. Babicz may be the gray eminence.

3. At formal meeting on December 14, there was further prolonged and fruitless discussions on the petitions referred to in preceding paragraph. I am glad to report that Hollies is visiting us, backs me on legal grounds in the stand I took. The problem of reintegration came up. As result of disagreement in military committee, military advisers had requested Commission to decide whether teams should (a) search out all the 600 of ex-Khmer resistants to see whether they had been satisfactorily reintegrated or (b) limit their investigations to cases which come to their attention or are brought up by military advisers. I supported (b) on grounds that teams would be unable to do a thorough job in such a widely scattered population and with so primitive a system of names and records and also because we should not risk prejudicing our projected talks with government on this matter by instituting a large-scale investigation which implied mistrust of them. Grosz stood out for (a). Chairman was in agreement with Canadian view but endeavoured to find a compromise. At one moment Grosz implied dissatisfaction with teams, but when taxed with this by me said he did not wish to pursue subject which was therefore postponed. In the next case it appeared that government might be guilty of miscarriage of justice and Commission agreed to take up case with Minister of Justice.

4. Military advisers met on 11 December and sent out special instructions ordering investigations by teams at Battambang, Kampot and Kompong Cham, all concerning reintegration. General instruction to all teams directed liaison team to have joint meeting with each team it visited. Hitherto the liaison team has on arrival at a team site broken up into national components, each one of whom then held a separate meeting with his compatriots. Activities of teams increasing. They all receive petitions daily on behalf of persons alleged to be wrongfully detained by government. Investigation of these petitions is in addition to investigations ordered by Commission.

5. Mr. U Nu arrives today and Commissioners meet him for dinner at Prime Minister's invitation.

PROGRESS REPORT FOR WEEK 17 TO 23 DECEMBER

1. Formal meetings, informal meetings and Military Committee meetings have this week been unsatisfactory and even unpleasant. The one qualified success of the week was the two and one-half hours meeting of Commissioners with Prime Minister and Foreign Minister.

2. The Commission had one formal meeting on December 17 at which Grosz and I maintained positions I sketched for you in paragraph 1 of my telegram under reference. Chairman reported that French Chargé d'Affaires appointed a liaison officer to the International Commission. It was decided to acquaint Cambodian Government with this appointment before we accepted it. Meeting also considered a letter from the Foreign Minister emphasizing French responsibility for the maintenance of law and order in parts of Vietnam where there have been unlawful Hoa-

Hao activities. We agreed to pass letter on the Hanoi Commission with covering note saying we supported the government's case. Some time was spent on the reports of the discovery of arms dumps at various places. Consideration of this item was finally deferred ostensibly to await further information from our teams in the districts concerned but actually because Grosz and I were in fundamental disagreement. Grosz assumes and asserts that government is making much ado about nothing. I maintain that they have a legitimate concern which Commission should take seriously. We also dealt with applications of former officers of Royal Army asking us to intervene so that they might be re-employed in the army. Since these cases fall under Article 6, I agreed to the sending of a mild letter to the government. In fact the penultimate paragraph of Article 6 covering application for service in the army is so loosely worded that it provides the government with several loop-holes.

3. On December 21, after we had returned from welcoming the King back after his visit to Bangkok, Commissioners held an informal meeting during which we attempted to iron out some of the differences which had arisen at the two previous formal meetings. The attempt was not completely successful. To make matters worse, Grosz produced four examples of alleged failure of Indian and Canadian members of various teams to carry out tasks which Grosz considers should have been undertaken. Chairman took a very serious view of these allegations, saying that both he and I could produce similar accusations if we wished to descend to that level and adding that he would have Grosz's "evidence" thoroughly examined. If the accusations proved groundless he would expect Grosz to make a retraction to be recorded in the minutes. I took little part in the battle following my usual line that when the Chairman and Grosz are at odds I should not interfere with Chairman's political education once I have signified agreement with him.

4. Commissioners had second informal meeting on December 22 during which reasonable harmony was restored, largely as a result of Parthasarathi's and my collaboration beforehand. Latter had made it clear to Grosz that if he insisted on (group corrupt) government on every occasion he would have to reckon with my defence of government. Rest of meeting was devoted to a preparation of our interview with Prime Minister and Foreign Minister which took place this morning, lasted for two and one-half hours and I hope, marked a turning point in our relations with government. Prime Minister expressed delight at opportunity for frank exchange of views and agreed to a meeting at the same time and place next week. He gave an admirable performance so that the meeting was quite exhilarating.

5. Chairman began by referring to matters which needed decision and had been pending too long, saying that Commission was about to report to the Co-Chairmen of Geneva Conference and wished to be able to say that progress although delayed, was continuing. Our main item was reintegration Article 6. Penn Nouth considered that by and large the problem was near solution. Those Ex-Khmer resisters who had not rallied were those who preferred to complain to the International Commission because they did not want to recognize the legal authority of the country. Government had no objection to (group corrupt) creating a party if they accepted the monarchy and the constitution. He agreed that there would be no illegal detention but insisted that propaganda must not be anti-monarchical and carried out within framework of the electoral law and the constitution. Until electoral campaign begins government will not open election hearing and public meetings.

6. Commission endeavoured to persuade Prime Minister to make the October amnesty a general amnesty but failed to convince Penn Nouth. My support of my colleagues on this matter was lukewarm as I think government have pretty good case and we ought not interfere further in this internal matter.

7. Prime Minister promised to reissue official instructions to provincial authorities to provide our teams with information which they need in their work. Our request for this arose because in one or two instances recently provincial governors have refused to give our teams information without prior consent of government in Phnom Penh.

8. At the close of the meeting Penn Nouth drew our attention to serious violations of Cambodian frontier by South Vietnamese troops, particularly in region of Svay Rieng and Prey Veng. We agreed to consider this matter with him at next meeting. Final point raised was French High Commission's decision to appoint a liaison officer to the Commission. On this Penn Nouth was brief and pointed he was against it and most appreciative of our having consulted government before acting. He made it quite clear that if we had any dealings with the French High Commission these must on no account concern Cambodian affairs over which France had no say whatsoever. You will find this point of particular political interest.

9. Political Advisers Committee. In last week's report I mentioned proposal to set up this committee. It has now had two meetings mostly concerned with matters of organization. I shall report in more detail on its work after I have had better opportunity of assessing it.

10. Military Advisers Committee. The meetings of this committee in the period under review have been unsatisfactory. Polish member spent long time requesting changes in minutes of previous meetings. His quarrel with Indian member continues. At the 25th meeting Babicz again raised question of putting a team in Snoul. Indian member pointed out that Kratie team had unanimously reported no need for a team at Snoul and no accommodation there. Babicz replied that Polish members had now changed their minds. He declined to produce a paper on the matter but agreed to take up with Grosz. At 26th meeting held December 23 Indian general stated Grosz had again accused him of issuing an instruction without concurrence of Babicz. Singh reviewed the whole case which I have previously mentioned in these reports. Babicz then stated for the first time in this long drawn-out battle that he had never seen the instructions. Canadian member stated that said instruction was approved at a meeting at which both he and Babicz were present. There the matter rests quietly.

11. Desrosiers arrived Saturday 18 December and is learning the ropes from Murray. On same day I had long interview with Richard Harris Times correspondent in Indo-China.

12. This report goes by DWS. I would appreciate information on its time of arrival and whether you would prefer me to continue using DWS or trying Indian signals once again.

13. Season's greetings from all of us to all of you and thanks for your support.

WEEKLY PROGRESS REPORT NO. 1 SEPTEMBER 28³⁵

For the first time the Joint Commission came to Vientiane for High Commissioner's meetings with International Commission. These meetings will continue until tonight. Last week both parties reported on liberation prisoners of war and civilian internees, the regroupment and transfer forces and clearance and the special convention called for in article 4(b).³⁶ This week the International Commission will hear both parties on the situation in Sam Neua and Phong Saly and Franco Laotian complaints of forced recruiting by PVV/PL since the cease fire.

2. The most important progress among Commissions has been agreements reached on September 27th regarding liberation and exchange of prisoners of war and civilian internees before October 10th. Discrepancies about precise numbers remain to be sorted out but both sides are co-operating and we anticipate no serious difficulty.

3. The PVV/PL continue to insist that special convention with regards to Vietnamese volunteers settled in Laos before hostilities is beyond competence Commissions and just re-established by two interested governments. The French insist if a convention is not signed by November 21st, the Royal Laotian Government will pass legislation based on a French delegation draft by which all, repeat all, Vietnamese who fought against Royal Government would be forced to leave Laos or for those wishing to remain be assembled in the province of Sam Neua and apply for residence there. Verification and scrutiny of applicants would be carried out under supervision and control of International Commission.

4. International Commission has complained strongly to PVV/PL that information from them on date and route of withdrawal and number and identity of units continue to be either inadequate or notified insufficiently in advance to permit proper supervision. The Government has indicated to the International Commission its increasing concern that forcibly recruited Laotians are being secretly withdrawn along with PVV/PL forces on the jungle route.

5. On the other hand, International Commissions' willingness to investigate such reports has been handicapped by inadequate air transport and slipshod timings by French military authorities. A mobile team sent out on September 28th to investigate a specific complaint — two battalions of forced recruits were being withdrawn, returned on October 2nd having failed their mission largely because of inadequately laid on helicopters. Without helicopters our teams are practically useless. Commission has renewed its demand to French and New Delhi representative being supplied information our minimum requirements are 4 helicopters, 2 or 3 light aircraft and 1 Dakota. 5th and 6th exclusive use International Commission.

WEEKLY PROGRESS REPORT NO. 2

Forced Recruitment

1. At meetings of the Joint Commission with the International Commission on October 4th and 5th Franco-Laotian delegation maintained that recruitment carried out by PVV/PL, in most cases under duress, was contrary to Articles (14) and (15) of Geneva Agreement and to agreement signed by Joint Commission on 29 August, which states that parties must not make use of transfers to reinforce their numbers and that there should be no compulsory transfers of population.

2. PVV/PL claimed that this apparent recruitment was only regrouping in provisional assembly areas of units which had been spread throughout the countryside.

3. Conclusive evidence of forced recruitment will be difficult to obtain. Poles agree in commission that forced recruitment would be violation of Geneva Agreement but at operational level are obstructing efforts of teams to carry investigations of transfers possibly involving force recruits.

Phong Saly — Sam Neua

4. No progress on this subject made at combined meetings. Both parties are to submit comprehensive aides-mémoire by 12 October. In response to a brief from Royal Government, Commission has asked Prime Minister to refrain from any action which might complicate a difficult situation pending further consideration.

5. Despite difficult weather conditions Phong Saly reconnaissance was completed this week and we are awaiting confirmation that fixed teams are now established in both Phong Saly and Sop Hao (Sam Neua).

Teams

6. More Polish personnel have arrived and mobile teams have now been based at Luang, Prabang and Savannakhet for reasons of accommodation and facilities for movement. A team will for first time supervise exchange of POWS at Hua Muong (Province of Sam Neua) on 11 October. On the spot inquiries may forestall possible future charges of ill-treatment.

7. Because of restrictive interpretation of functions and responsibilities by Polish team members, it has become necessary and Commission has agreed, to set up a committee of alternates to draft broader instructions for fixed teams.

Secretariat

8. Temporary assignment of Canadian (Maranda) and Polish Deputy Secretaries and arrival of 1 interpreter from Geneva should help Secretariat keep up with day to day work. It will be more difficult to cope with the back-log. Commission has approved provisional distribution of work amongst Deputy Secretaries General. For India administration meetings and general. For Canada (operations I) liaison with joint commission subjects under Article 4 (except sub-para B) subjects under Chapter III Article 18 of Chapter (V) and Article 26 of Chapter VI. For Poland (operations II) charge of public relations (this is nominal as Indian PRO will report direct to chairman) work relating to sub-para (b) Article 4, Articles 6 to 10 inclusive and Article 16 and complaints. Chairman and ourselves had difficulty in over-riding Polish insistence that their deputy be responsible for work under Article 14 re Phong Saly and Sam Neua.

General

9. Political activity by both parties is increasing. At the same time they are both stalling on proposing solutions to major problems and we expect little change until the present crisis in Royal Government is resolved. The National Assembly has been convened for an extraordinary session on 15 October. If a conciliatory government is formed, we can be hopeful for some progress otherwise more serious difficulties will no doubt arise.

LAOS COMMISSION WEEKLY REPORT NO. 3

1. Teams. Team is in operation at Phong Saly but wireless communication not established with Sam Neua team which supervised prisoner of war handover at Hua Muong en route and when last heard of on 15 October was still stranded there by weather.

2. Special mobile team left 16 October to areas north of Vientiane city to investigate simultaneously (group corrupt) complaints regarding forced recruitment and PVV/PL charges of intimidation and pressure on population.

3. Disagreement in Committee over broader and more satisfactory instructions for teams caused by last minute refusal of Polish member (after he had previously accepted draft) to accept principle that when two members of a team decide to undertake an enquiry the third should participate although dissenting member might refer to International Commission but without delaying the enquiry. This important point was resolved by Commission with a satisfactory compromise wording as a result of our firm stand vigorously supported by the Chairman.

4. It has been agreed that this committee of senior political advisors should also be given responsibility for proposing action on complaints or as a result of reports from teams. This should help to ensure prompt action being taken and expedite the work of the Commission itself.

5. Phong Saly and Sam Neua. In their efforts to defend restrictive attitude to activities of teams and in particular their opposition to investigation by Phong Saly and Sam Neua teams of location and disposition of P.L. forces in these two provinces Poles have now for the first time stated clearly in Commission that they will insist on interpreting Geneva Agreement to give complete military and civil control these two provinces to Pathet Lao and will deny authority of Royal Government. Thus the most important issue before the Commission has been joined.

6. Political. Assembly has been convened and it is anticipated that a government of national unity will be formed within 10 days or a fortnight. We understand from good authority that present Prime Minister is continuing his negotiations with the Pathet Lao and that two posts will be kept in new government for them with a view to their participation.

7. It has been reported in Saigon press and confirmed privately to us by official sources that more than 20 arrests of 'ultra-nationalists' (mostly army but including a former President of the National Assembly) have been made in connection with murder of late Minister of National Defence.

8. General. Nehru's crowded three hour visit on October 17 although not of immediate practical help to the Commission was useful indication of India's interest in Laos. He had nothing concrete or specific to say either to the Government or to the Commission. The Commission also met briefly on 13 October, M. Guy Le Chambre, French Minister for the Associated States, for a general discussion of our difficulties.

LAOS COMMISSION WEEKLY REPORT NO. 4

Phong Saly and Sam Neua

During the past week the International Commission both at commission level and in committee has been concerned almost entirely with the situation in the 2 northern provinces.

2. The discussion arose out of series of questions for guidance our fixed teams in 2 provinces proposed by Canadian delegation. My purpose was to check and destroy PVV/PL claim that the Pathet Lao exercise de facto military and administrative control over the full territory of 2 provinces except for small Laotian National Army units legally parachuted by French after cease fire. The Polish delegate wanted to investigate only such NLA units as were involved in PL accusations of violation of agreement. At threat of vote he yielded to compromise and I agreed that such units should be dealt with as a matter of priority. The Pole also refused to agree to enquire about location and strength etc. of PL forces. I argued the necessity for this full enquiry under Article 19. At the same time the Poles refused to agree that PVV/PL delegation on Joint Commission be asked to send sub-groups to Phong Saly and Sam Neua to assist our teams in investigation. The compromise to avoid a vote was agreement to leave out enquiries about Pathet Lao units for time being in return for demand on Joint Commission to send sub-groups. My decision based on judgement that question of location and strength of the units is most urgent. It is probably wise to initiate the action of our teams on this question, especially as we are short of helicopters.

3. I shall raise more substantive issues concerning Phong Saly and Sam Neua this week by proposing procedures whereby Laotian Government can gradually assume civil administration there. In this I will have support of Indian delegation although chairman will do his best to avoid any open division in the commission.

4. Political. Katay Sasorith, former Minister of Finance, has been asked to attempt to form a government.

[Ottawa], November 2, 1954

POLICY OF THE CANADIAN COMMISSIONER IN LAOS

You spoke to me the other day about the Minister's concern as to whether the policy of seeking compromise agreements with other members of the Supervisory Commissions might not be going too far. Although I expressed to you my own impression that the Commissioner in Vientiane had been playing his compromises skilfully, I said, I would discuss with the Far Eastern Division a possible telegram to one or all the Commissioners indicating some concern on the subject.

I have discussed the matter with Mr. Menzies and find that he shares my opinion. We are both somewhat worried about a telegram which might be interpreted at this early stage and in the absence of other guidance from us as a signal to get tougher than our position warrants. We agree certainly that the Commissioners should all be very careful not to surrender for bargaining purposes any major principles or sacrifice the interests of our friends. On the other hand, we see no alternative at the moment to seeking our ends by striking hard bargains. The fact is that we have very little to bargain with in Laos. Whereas in Vietnam the Communists have a considerable interest in retaining the Commission in operation and seeing that the terms of the Armistice are carried out, in Laos, it is they who would gain from a breakdown of the Commission. If we are to force issues before we have to, the Pole might not be too reluctant to have the Commission break down in stalemate, for the Communists would then be left to consolidate their position in Phong Saly and Sam Neua without interference. We shall probably have to clash with them some time, but if this clash could be postponed at least until after we can get the Commission in operation in these two northern districts, something may be saved. At the present time, the Indian Chairman is supporting Mr. Mayrand but anxious to avoid any open division in the Commission. So long as such a favourable balance can be maintained in the Commission by judicious compromise, Mr. Menzies and I think we should be hesitant to discourage the Commissioner. We realize of course that we may well get into trouble with our Allies and even with Canadian public opinion if we don't take rigid positions and indulge in a little table banging. We still think however, that it is better to endeavour for the present to outwit the enemy rather than to play his game by breaking up the Commission.

PHONG SALY AND SAM NEUA

You are doubtless aware that the United Kingdom authorities are much concerned — as we are too — about the situation in the two northeastern provinces and particularly about the refusal of the PVV/PL backed by the Poles to permit the establishment of the civil authority of the Royal Laotian Government in these provinces. They are somewhat disturbed by the reluctance of the Indian Commissioner to take a definitive stand on this matter and are proposing to take the matter up with Nehru on his return to New Delhi on November 5. We understand that the United Kingdom Minister in Vientiane has suggested to you that you might defer forcing the issue to a vote until their representations to the Indian Government have taken effect.

2. We would be grateful for your comments as to whether these United Kingdom representations to the Indians taken on their own initiative are helpful or not. We would not wish United Kingdom pressure on the Indians to complicate your own relations with the Indian Chairman on the Laos Commission, or to jeopardize the support he has so far given you in seeing that the Commission fully discharges its responsibilities.

3. We assume that the compromises you have reported in your telegram under reference have been made in the interests of carrying the Indian chairman along with you at each step and of deferring for the moment pressure for Commission decisions which are temporarily beyond the capacity of the inspection teams to carry out owing to practical difficulties of transport and communications.

4. We would like to know whether you are hopeful that continued pressure by you with Indian support will induce the Poles to back down from their insistence on interpreting the Laos Agreement as giving complete military and civil control of the northeastern provinces to the Pathet Lao, or whether you think a showdown on this point is inevitable. If the latter is more likely, the question will presumably be mainly one of determining when the Indians may be prepared to face up to the first split vote on any of the three Commissions. Such a split vote might, of course, involve a refusal by the Pathet Lao to accept the recommendations of the Commission and a reference to the Geneva Conference powers. In view of these serious implications the effect of United Kingdom representations to the Indians will be important.

NORTHERN PROVINCES OF PHONG SALY AND SAM NEUA

In my opinion Franco-Laotian delegation on Joint Commission made first mistake in not pressing from the start for establishment of Pathet/Lao zones under Article 12 in these two provinces and International Commission also made mistake in not insisting that the two parties should carry out that provision. As a result People's Vietnamese Volunteers/Pathet Lao claim to occupation of the entire two provinces under Article 14, without regard for Article 12, has gained appearance of right and is more difficult to combat now.

2. My personal view is that Article 12 should have been implemented in conjunction with Article 14 and that provisional assembly areas in Phong Saly and Sam Neua should have been delimited large enough to provide for all the Pathet/Lao fighting units to be moved there under Article 14. Royal Laotian administration could then have returned to areas not occupied by Pathet/Lao.

3. Indian chairman starts from idea that Geneva Agreement is not clear as regards Articles 12 and 14 and is willing to press for division of territory only under Article 19 if and when it has been established that national Laotian Army forces were actually in control of part of the territory of the two provinces when cease-fire came into effect.

4. Our delegation has forced enquiry into presence of National Laotian Army forces in the two provinces and a few days ago we ascertained that such enquiry will be pursued as a matter of priority by International Commission teams thereby overcoming deliberate Polish dilatory methods. Furthermore, during session with Joint Commission last week, I asked a series of questions aimed at establishing illegality of People's Vietnamese Volunteers/Pathet Lao stand under Geneva Agreement in the light of general rules of treaty interpretation.

5. People's Vietnamese Volunteers/Pathet Lao delegation declined to answer my questions on the ground that recent statement by Prince Souphannom Vong has cleared the way for settlement. This statement, which says that "the Pathet/Lao forces recognize the Royal Government and in principle the administration of Pathet/Lao in the two provinces as placed under the supreme authority of the Royal Government", is a renunciation by the Pathet/Lao to their former claim that they were a de jure government. However, the de facto Pathet/Lao Government is to continue as such until political settlement is reached.

6. Atmosphere should become easier when People's Vietnamese Volunteers forces have completed evacuation of Laos by November 19. Meanwhile, it is unfortunate that Cabinet crisis has not been solved as yet. In my opinion, the Pathet/Lao are not at all Communist as a whole and I do think that political settlement might come soon after November 19 with Royal Laotian Government reasonably disposed to conciliation.

7. In conclusion, I find situation legally illogical but politically not alarming. For the time being, I consider it my task to push towards betterment of legal position at least under Article 19 with a view to placing Royal Laotian Government in the position to which they are entitled under the Geneva Agreement.

Your telegram No. 16 of November 4, concerning Phong Saly and Sam Neua received only today. My telegram No. 172 of [November] 8, may have answered part of your queries.

2. I do not, repeat not, think that United Kingdom representations in New Delhi risk complicating my relations with Indian Chairman, if made discreetly and without appearance of my connivance. Khosla only lacks boldness and is prone to wait for solution under eventual political settlement instead of taking action through our Commission. It would, therefore, help if Nehru were to recommend firmer line to Khosla.

3. Your interpretation of my compromises as stated in paragraph 3 of your telegram is correct.

4. As regards your paragraph 4, I do not, repeat not, believe that Polish Commissioner will ever back down on this problem of the two provinces unless Pathet Lao themselves agree to come to terms with Royal Laotian Government. A showdown is inevitable unless political settlement is reached.

5. In view of continued Cabinet crisis and approaching date of final withdrawal of Vietnamese forces from Laos viz November 19, I propose withholding initiative until that date. Meanwhile, I shall seek audience with Crown Prince in whom I have special confidence and call again on Acting Prime Minister Souvanna Phouma. INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION LAOS — WEEKLY REPORT NO. 8

During the past week there has been a certain lull in the proceedings of the International Commission which has been concurred in to some extent insofar as we are concerned because of the inability of any of the political leaders in Vientiane to form a government. I consider it most important to seek the advice and concurrence of any new government in the formulation of a recommendation for political action which that government would be called upon to implement. For this reason I have held up forcing in the Commission my recommendations based on the recent Pathet Lao acceptance in principle of the sovereignty of the Royal Government for the assertion of the administrative authority of the Royal Government in the provinces of Phong Saly and Sam Neua. Koshla has given me his assurance that he backs me 100 percent and that as soon as a government is formed we should take appropriate action in the Commission.

2. Nevertheless, this has been an important week for the International Commission. We are today issuing a press release noting with satisfaction the report received from the Joint Commission of the Franco-Laotian and People's Vietnamese Volunteers/Pathet-Lao Commands that the French Union forces, except for those allowed in the Geneva Agreement, and all People's Vietnamese Volunteers forces have now been withdrawn completely from the territory of Laos. While I had some hesitation about this release, especially in view of our lack of precise information about the situation in the 2 northern provinces, I think it in the main true and appropriate to state that the most important military provision of the agreement has been implemented by both sides at least in the letter.

3. The political committee has had its difficulties because the Poles went back on their verbal agreement that in accordance with Article 24 complaints should first be investigated by the Joint Commission. But in the Commission itself after a long rearguard action by the Pole we were able to salvage enough of the recommendations of the committee to direct the Secretariat that in the first instance the parties should be asked to contact each other for the settlement of a dispute unless the dispute was of a serious nature when it should immediately be brought to the attention of the political committee or of the International Commission.

4. There was one unusually harmonious meeting this week when the Canadian Delegation presented a re-draft in form of a Polish recommendation on democratic rights which in its final form of a letter to the Joint Commission requested both parties to give wide publicity to Articles 15 and 17 of the Geneva Agreement and in spite of Polish reluctance as well to the paragraph in the Geneva declaration of the Government of Laos stating its intention to integrate all citizens without discrimination into the national community.

INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION LAOS — WEEKLY REPORT NO. 9

This has been an active week for the Commission, especially for our teams in the mountainous jungle of the northern provinces. Serious incidents in Phong Saly and Sam Neua have underlined the situation there as a threat to peace. They have also emphasized the frustration of the Commission in its inability to carry out investigations and supervision properly in that area because of the non-availability of air transport.

2. Incidents. Two serious incidents were reported to the Commission early in the week and a third allegedly serious situation was drawn to our attention on the 26 in a letter from the Prime Minister. First, a Vietnamese Volunteer/Pathet Lao force 200 strong was said to have engaged a Laotian National Army unit at Pong Nang in Phong Saly on November 18. The Royal Government press attempted to use this report as proof that People's Vietnamese Volunteer elements had not withdrawn from Laos. Secondly our sub-team in Sam Neua reported that during the night of November 22-23, pirates attacked the Pathet Lao occupied town of Sam Neua. Fighting took place in the team compound. The Commission has given priority to investigations into these 2 incidents. We have no transport available to investigate the incidents which the Prime Minister states took place in Ban Saeui in Sam Neua on November 24 and which he claims are liable to have serious repercussions. At the same time our Saphao team has had to be withdrawn from an important investigation in order to supervise the reassembly of Pathet Lao forces passing from Vietnam into Sam Neua.

3. Laotian National Army troops in Phong Saly and Sam Neua. I took these incidents as sufficient reason to raise once more in the Commission the necessity for the supervision and control of the armed forces of both parties in the northern provinces. With the cooperation of the Chairman I secured agreement from my Polish colleague

(a) to move our helicopter based at Seno in the South to Plaine des Jarres which is the best place for servicing Northern Laos,

(b) to set up a new mobile team at Xieng Khouang specifically for the purpose of investigating the presence of Laotian National Army forces in the 2 provinces and

(c) to request the Joint Commission to have liaison officers made available to our teams when joint sub-groups cannot be provided.

4. Transport. The Commission's transport difficulties were dramatically emphasized by the forced landing and loss by fire on the 20th of one of the two helicopters normally at the disposition of our teams in the north. Our Phong Saly team escaped serious injury and displayed what the French liaison officer described as uncommon endurance during the 3 days they trekked through the jungle to safety. A report of this incident has been released to the press. It was almost anti-climatic when we had news that the Beaver carrying officers to make special enquiries at Sam Neua had been damaged in landing at Saphao. The aircraft is out of commission and the officers have been stranded for the past several days. In the circumstances the only reasonable reply we could make to the Commission in Hanoi in response to their request for the use of our helicopter based at Xieng Khouang to conduct investigations in the neighbouring areas of Vietnam, was that the Commissions should appeal jointly to the French authorities to make another helicopter available in that area for the joint use of the 2 Commissions.

5. General. Ending the Cabinet crisis which began on October 19, the National Assembly on November 25 voted confidence in a government headed by Katay Sasorith. Souvanna Phouma and Phoui Sananikone, formerly Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs respectively, remain in the government as Vice Presidents of the Council. I am confident the new government will give first priority to the problem of the situation in the 2 northern provinces.

6. The Commission goes today to present its respects to King at Luang Prabang. It will return tomorrow.

INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION LAOS PROGRESS REPORT NO. 12

Because of alterations in and uncertainty about courier connections and the difficulties involved in telegraphic communication of long messages from this post this delayed report covers the period December 11 to December 20.

2. Teams and investigations. The main operational difficulty with which the Commission has had to cope during the period under review has been the non-availability of or incompleteness of joint groups representing the two parties to assist our teams in carrying out priority investigations in the northern provinces. On December 12 the Commission ordered the mobile team from Xieng Khouang to proceed immediately to Hong Kyon in Sam Neua to investigate a Royal Government complaint that the Pathet Lao were menacing the position of Royal Army forces there but the Peoples Vietnamese Volunteer/Pathet Lao delegation refused to provide the team with a joint group on the grounds that they had not received sufficient information about the complaint and that they considered other complaints of murder and arson they had previously made against the Franco-Laotian party of greater importance. It was only after a lengthy exchange of messages reiterating the insistence of the Commission that the Peoples Vietnamese Volunteer/Pathet Lao agreed to provide their liaison component with the joint group on December 17. Then the Commission had to intervene with the Franco-Laotian side to secure helicopter transport for the Peoples Vietnamese Volunteer/Pathet Lao group who insisted on being taken en route first to the town of Sam Neua for briefing at their headquarters. The team was finally able to begin the enquiry 1 week after it had been given immediate priority by the Commission. A similar situation arose in Thong Saly where the Pathet Lao objected to a wireless set and operator accompanying the Franco-Laotian element in the joint group which it was said arrived without credentials from the Joint Commission.

3. As a result of this frustration and delay for our teams and bickering between the parties the Chairman and the Canadian delegation firmly resolved that drastic action must be taken by the Commission despite Polish unwillingness to be critical of the usefulness of joint groups and so open the way to a demand for their disbandment under Article 28. Our position was strengthened by a rudely worded letter from the Peoples Vietnamese Volunteer/Pathet Lao delegation which in effect dictated to the Commission the conditions under which the Peoples Vietnamese Volunteer/Pathet Lao would operate in the carrying out of investigations. While the wording of the Commission's reply represented some slight concession to the Polish attempts to defend the tone of Colonel Tinh's letter it did state clearly that in case joint groups were not practicable or available the Commission considered that the parties might authorize liaison officers or local representatives to represent them for the purpose of investigation. It also stated that the Commission reserved the right itself to decide the priority which should be given to investigations. Having gained the first round in the Commission we instructed the Political Committee to review the situation and come up with recommendations for a solution of the problem. The Canadian representative produced a draft letter to the Joint Commission stating that the International Commission was in no way bound or prepared to accept this unsatisfactory situation and that the International Commission teams could be instructed to proceed with investigations even if joint groups or liaison officers were not available from the Joint Commission. The Polish representative on the Committee flatly refused to accept this even though it was put to him that rather than dispensing with liaison officers from both sides this would ensure that both parties would make every effort to be represented during investigations. It will now go to the Commission where the Chairman is determined to secure acceptance of it in 1 version or another.

4. Northern provinces. Published content by the Laotian Government on December 10 welcomed the substance of the Commission's recommendation with regard to a political settlement between the Pathet Lao and the Royal Government as well as its timing by stating that the authority of the Royal Government could not be exercised there before the Vietminh forces were withdrawn on November 19. Meanwhile a Peoples Vietnamese Volunteer/Pathet Lao submission from Sam Neua complaining that the International Commission had not enquired amongst Pathet Lao troops in order that the Franco-Laotian charges of forced recruitment might be disproved presented me with the opportunity of raising once more in the Commission the question of investigating these units in Phong Saly and Sam Neua. The Polish Political Adviser in committee had refused to agree to the Indian and Canadian recommendation that the Commission should ask for a list showing concentrations of Pathet Lao forces. He said the International Commission teams could conduct enquiries occasionally in some Pathet Lao detachments. Later in the Commission my Polish colleague developed the argument that the Pathet Lao had the right to occupy and control the whole of the two provinces. The Commission had no right to check the Pathet Lao forces there except within the limits set by the Pathet Lao themselves. I of course could not agree nor compromise on this question of principle. The Chairman is hopeful that in private conversation he may be able to bring the question back to one of procedure and so secure the Poles' acceptance of the majority recommendation of the Political Committee.

5. Democratic freedom. On 15 December the Commission approved an Indian draft circular on civil liberties and democratic freedoms referring particularly to Article 15 and 17 and the relevant portion of the Royal Government's Geneva Declaration. It has been sent to the Joint Commission for an agreed translation into Laotian. The Poles are obviously most anxious that it should receive wide circulation in the South in order that the number of complaints in this category against the Royal Government may span an increase. On the other hand they are reluctant to agree that the circular should be distributed by our teams which is one of the few ways we can help to have it distributed in the northern areas controlled by the Pathet Lao.

6. Placement of fixed teams. The Commission has asked the Royal Government for its agreement (in accordance with Article 26) to moving the fixed team for the province of Sam Neua from Saphao to the town of Sam Neua itself which offers better communication facilities, accommodation, and is the Pathet Lao administrative headquarters. At the request of the Franco-Laotian party the Commission has agreed in principle to placing the fixed team at Tchepone which is called for under the Geneva Agreement.

INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION LAOS PROGRESS REPORT NO. 13

Approach of Christmas, plus work on the report for the Chairman of the Geneva Conference, plus tragic death of Mr. Thurrott were cause that there were only two Commission meetings last week.

2. Teams and investigations. Our mobile team from Xieng Khouang did succeed in obtaining from commanders of two parties in Nong Khan, Sam Neua, promise that they would refrain from attacking one another. It was hard mission during which team felt not too secure. For some reason still to be determined Franco-Laotian side failed to send joint group which would have permitted investigation of National Laotian army unit nearby. The rations of our team having exhausted we have just authorized them to return to their base.

3. Commission did adopt our proposal to inform Joint Commission that in case joint groups or liaison officers are not made available by the parties or party, the International Commission will be compelled to undertake such steps as it will deem necessary to make the work of its teams effective independently of the party or parties which fail to make the liaison available.

4. (Two groups corrupt) of joint sub-commissions and joint groups. Under instructions from the French High Command the chief of Franco-Laotian Delegation to the Joint Commission has fixed for next January first the regroupment at Khang

Khay (seat of the Joint Commission) of the joint sub-commissions for Central and Lower Laos as well as the joint groups attached to them. This means that only the Joint Commission itself and its 6 joint groups for Upper Laos will remain in existence as from that date. We had informally recommended this action to the Laotian authorities under Article 28 of the Geneva Agreement. The purpose is to dissociate People's Vietnamese Volunteers from Pathet Laos and to prevent them from conducting activities in territory controlled by the Royal Government.

5. In the same spirit Royal Government has indicated willingness to receive liaison mission of the opposite party in Vientiane on condition that such mission includes only delegates of Laotian nationality representing the movement called Pathet Lao.

MOST-FAVOURED-NATION TRADE AGREEMENT WITH JAPAN

The discussions between Canadian and Japanese officials regarding the proposed Agreement have now been concluded. The text which has emerged appears to be acceptable to both sides and is in conformity with the instructions which Cabinet has given from time to time to the Canadian negotiating group. After it has been reviewed in detail, a memorandum will be prepared for submission to Cabinet seeking formal approval of this text,† a copy of which is attached, prior to signature. In the meantime you may wish to have this brief note concerning the present position, especially since the Japanese Ambassador may be calling on you within the next few days and may refer to this subject in the course of his conversation.

2. Although the negotiations have taken a considerable time, there was probably no point at which either side felt that the other was deliberately stalling. Numerous technical difficulties were encountered and lengthy explanations had to be made by each side at one time or another. Apart from one unfortunate episode involving woodpulp (where certain Japanese officials appeared to have misled us — and apparently their negotiating team as well), the atmosphere surrounding the talks has been very good, and each side has shown a readiness to consider sympathetically the problems of the other. You may wish to mention to the Ambassador that the Canadian group developed a very healthy respect for the negotiating abilities of Mr. Inagaki and his colleagues.

3. The Japanese language text of the Agreement is being prepared in Tokyo and will be supplied to us shortly for our examination and approval. Mr. Inagaki returned to Tokyo last night in order to hasten this translation and also to participate in the working out of the arrangements that will be necessary for ensuring that imports of the nine commodities listed in one of the accompanying notes will take place on a competitive and non-discriminatory basis. He will also be consulting with his authorities and with our Embassy concerning the kind of information which is to be supplied to us periodically after the Agreement comes into force in order to keep us informed on how the Agreement is working.

4. Before his departure, Mr. Inagaki expressed the view that signature of the Agreement should be possible early in February and that ratification action by the Japanese Diet might be initiated in March.

5. During the last meeting with him, Mr. Inagaki referred to the possibility that Japan might receive as much as 500,000 tons of wheat from the United States under a special arrangement of the kind envisaged in the notorious Section 550 of the Mutual Security Act.³⁷ Although the Canadian side had been informed confidentially of this possibility by the State Department some time ago (and were aware that fairly strong representations had been made to the United States on this proposal, especially with respect to the adverse effects which such a transaction might have on Canada's normal commercial sales to Japan), they did not comment too vigorously on Mr. Inagaki's rather casual reference to the matter beyond expressing the hope that the Japanese authorities would refrain from action inconsistent with the letter and spirit of the draft Agreement even in the period before the Agreement actually comes into force. It was pointed out to Mr. Inagaki that, apart from the commercial consequences for Canada of any action which might be, or appear to be, discriminatory in character, his people would doubtless wish to have in mind the psychological consequences of any such action in relation to the reception of the Agreement in Canada. Both sides obviously had an interest in creating an atmosphere which would be favourable to acceptance of an Agreement which promised to be mutually advantageous.

6. If you are talking with Mr. Iguchi concerning this draft Agreement, you may wish to re-emphasize the desirability of both countries avoiding any action at this time which could prejudice the prospects for the Agreement. You might wish to mention specifically the reports which we have had concerning the possibility of a wheat deal between Japan and the United States, and you might wish to observe that, if Japan were to procure wheat in a manner which did not provide an opportunity for Canada to compete for the business, we should regard such a transaction as contrary to the non-discriminatory provisions of our proposed Agreement. You might wish to add that such a transaction, especially if it were to be for a substantial quantity, would make it very difficult to convince the Canadian people that the Agreement when ratified would really help to maintain or increase Canada's trade with Japan. The fact that some of the U.S. wheat may be soft, whereas most of our wheat is hard — which Mr. Inagaki mentioned in his brief remarks — would seem to be quite irrelevant to the main issue. The draft Agreement envisages complete non-discrimination with respect to imports of all wheat (apart from certain exceptions specifically mentioned in the confidential note accompanying the Agreement).

7. It may be that before Mr. Iguchi sees you Mr. Howe will have had an opportunity to discuss with you the question of what might be said formally to the Japanese authorities (as well as to the United States) about this wheat deal. If you and Mr. Howe have not had an opportunity to discuss it, the remarks suggested above would seem to be reasonable and to reflect Canada's interests in the proposed transaction. While it can be represented that the supply of wheat to Japan under such special arrangements (resulting in the accumulation of yen for use by the Japanese Government) is about the only way in which the U.S. can assist the Japanese in financing their re-armament or defence expenditures, it would seem extremely doubtful that we should accept such an argument. The fact that the United States Congress may be willing to make funds available only in connection with the disposal of its surplus agricultural products would not seem to provide sufficient reason for us to acquiesce in a transaction which would be discriminatory and which would greatly reduce the value of our proposed Agreement with Japan. In the end, of course, it may be necessary as a practical matter to arrive at some compromise whereby the United States would supply a smaller quantity of wheat than that now envisaged and would ensure that the shipment of such wheat would be spread over a sufficiently long period of time to keep interference with our normal trade to a minimum. Meanwhile, however, it would seem desirable for us to let Japan (as well as the United States) know that we are concerned at the implications of the rumoured deal and regard it as discriminatory and contrary to the basic principles of our proposed Agreement.

MOST-FAVOURLED-NATION TRADE AGREEMENT WITH JAPAN AND REPORTS OF SPECIAL JAPANESE WHEAT PURCHASES FROM THE UNITED STATES

In paragraph 7 of my memorandum of January 7, I mentioned Mr. Howe's interest in this matter. Since that memorandum was sent to you there has been some interdepartmental discussions among officials concerning the desirability of Mr. Howe informing the Japanese Ambassador of his concern at the proposed wheat deal with the United States. I attach the text of a letter prepared during those discussions which it was thought Mr. Howe might give to Mr. Iguchi.

2. Since it seemed desirable to keep this subject on a commercial basis at this stage (and to avoid for the present any discussion of the difficulties which the Japanese might be experiencing in meeting their food requirements and of the relationship of this transaction to the financing of Japanese rearmament) it was felt that it would be appropriate for the Minister of Trade & Commerce to be the one to receive the Japanese Ambassador. It also appeared that something resembling a personal letter might be the most effective means of conveying these views to the Ambassador, especially since the trade agreement is of course not yet in force and there is therefore no legal basis for a formal protest from us.

3. Mr. Howe has now in fact seen the Japanese Ambassador this morning and has given him the proposed letter supplemented by his own oral remarks. I understand that Mr. Iguchi showed no surprise at the receipt of these representations. He said quite frankly that he was already aware of the probability that the proposed transaction would not be well received in Canada and he had advised Tokyo to this effect. He told Mr. Howe that he would immediately inform Tokyo of this morning's conversation and of the contents of the letter.

4. In case you may be talking with Mr. Iguchi in the near future you will doubtless wish to be aware of the exchange which Mr. Howe has already had with him on this subject.

My dear Ambassador:

I have received reports to the effect that the Japanese Government will probably purchase substantial quantities of wheat and barley from the United States under the provisions of Section 550 of the Mutual Security Act. From the information which I have, I would think such purchases by Japan might well prove to be inconsistent with the principles of unconditional non-discriminatory treatment of wheat and barley which are at the heart of the projected agreement on commerce between Japan and Canada. In my view, any purchases of wheat and barley for which Canadian suppliers are not granted an equal opportunity of competing, would be discriminatory and in conflict with the principles which, it is hoped, may soon govern commercial relations between Canada and Japan.

In addition, I would wish to emphasize that the prospect of such purchases, and the serious curtailment or temporary elimination of Canadian sales of wheat and barley to Japan which might result therefrom, would have an adverse effect on the climate of opinion in Canada regarding the establishment of most-favoured-nation trade relations with Japan. In my opinion, it would be particularly unfortunate if anything were to happen at this time to impair the basis of an agreement which is now approaching a successful conclusion.

January 8. First day spent in courtesy calls on officials of Ministry of International Trade and Industry and Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Most of the talks dealt in generalities. The most interesting remark was made by Mr. Matsuo, Deputy Chief of the International Trade Bureau of MITI, who said that MITI would favour a wheat contract with the Canadian Wheat Board in order that wheat movement might be programmed. Actual buying and contract, if any, would be a matter for the Japanese Food Agency a division of the Department of Agriculture and Forestry. There appears to be great rivalry between MITI and the Agency.

2. In the Ministry of Foreign Affairs we called on Mr. Oda, the Chief of the Economic Affairs Bureau, who will be leaving in March to be Minister in London. Mr. Oda said that before leaving his job he had wanted to finish the trade agreement with Canada and also to clean up the Japanese position with respect to MSA. We did not question him on the latter point.

3. On the evening of January 8 reception was given by Mr. Britton attended by prominent officials and grain trade. Mr. Izumoi, who used to be with Embassy in Ottawa and now with MITI, took Vogel aside to say in great confidence that Food Agency very tricky and must be watched. Izumoi said Agency too wants wheat contract and will probably originally suggest 450,000 tons. He said that real figure in Agency's mind is 700,000 tons but he did not know if either figure included quantities already bought this year. He said grain mission should be very careful not to appear anxious for contract and should leave first move up to Agency.

4. Later during reception Mr. Matsuo told Riddell and Vogel that 500,000 tons of wheat might be obtained from United States under Section 550. We told him that we were sure Ottawa would regard it as discriminatory if purchase of only United States wheat to be considered because payment in yen. We told him that in return for substantial tariff concessions on Japanese goods Canada had not asked for guarantees of quantities etc., but had only asked for non-discriminatory treatment on selected commodities. We told Matsuo that Inagaki (due Tokyo Saturday) was undoubtedly well aware of what Canadian attitude would be. Matsuo suggested perhaps Section 550 a special case but we told him it was impossible to have special discrimination when convenient and that agreement provides for discrimination only in special cases like Argentine wheat deal.

5. On Saturday morning paid courtesy call on Mr. Maetani, Head of Food Agency, but beyond learning interesting statistics of the ever increasing Japanese use of wheat and barley we did not come to grips. First real business meetings (as opposed to courtesy calls) will commence today.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following for M.W. Sharp, Trade and Commerce Department, repeat R.M. Esdale, Trade and Commerce Department, for G.H. McIvor, Canadian Wheat Board, from G.N. Vogel, Begins: Had further meetings with Food Agency on Wednesday. We discussed many points with respect to particular requirements of Japanese markets. No specific discussion re wheat contract but we learn confidentially, from personal sources, that a result of our visit here has been to convince Food Agency of desirability of contract and that negotiations will probably be opened shortly through Japanese Ambassador in Ottawa. We understand contract (which will probably cover a quantity of from 450 thousand to 700 thousand tons) will cover sales from November 1st last to end of next August. Unless there is a great change of heart after we leave here, we are confident that contract will materialize. Food Agency also considering possibility of barley contract but No. 1 feed barley is a great problem for them because of mixture of 6 row and 2 row varieties.

2. No further meetings planned with Food Agency. Rest of stay here will be spent in visiting mills, bakeries and barley processing plants. We are leaving for Hong Kong via BOAC on Sunday night, which is 24 hours earlier than planned itinerary.

3. Outstanding impression of Japan is the tremendous potential for sales of wheat. The mills, etc., we have seen would be impressive even if full consumption had been reached but in fact wheat consumption is only beginning. Use of flour here last year increased 50 per cent over previous year. This is, furthermore, a quality bread market which appreciates and wants Canadian wheat. If mills had free choice of wheat supplies there is no doubt that Canadian wheat would dominate.

4. Cannot speak too highly of Britton's assistance here and of his outstanding personal connections with senior officials and trade.

5. Raised question of 2 cargoes No. 1 feed barley sold Prince Rupert January. Food Agency says cannot discover any importers who took on such purchases but are still investigating. It may be that Canadian exporters have simply gone long.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 15-54

Ottawa, January 18, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL

AGREEMENT ON COMMERCE WITH JAPAN

The negotiations between the Canadian Negotiating Group and members of the Japanese Embassy for the proposed trade treaty have now produced draft texts of the Agreement and the supplementary notes which are satisfactory to both sides.³⁸ This Memorandum summarises the developments and the results of the negotiations and seeks Cabinet approval for the Government of Canada to enter into the proposed Agreement.

The Canadian Negotiating Group has consisted of officials from the Departments of External Affairs, Finance, and Trade and Commerce designated by Cabinet on July 31, 1952. In addition to the original instructions given to the Group by Cabinet at its meeting on November 19, 1952, Cabinet has also considered a number of specific points in the proposed Agreement and provided guidance for the Negotiating Group on several occasions, (notably at its meetings on January 30, July 6, September 29 and October 21, 1953).³⁹ The draft Agreement, a copy of which is attached to this submission, is in accordance with the lines laid down from time to time by Cabinet.

It will be recalled that the Negotiating Group originally was instructed:

- (1) to seek a reservation of the right to apply fixed values on imports which cause or threaten to cause serious injury to Canadian industry; and
- (2) to seek certain assurances from Japan concerning the treatment of Canadian exports; including an undertaking by Japan not to discriminate against imports from Canada in the application of trade and exchange restrictions, which would in effect be additional to any safeguards afforded by GATT in the event that Japan is admitted to GATT.

The Cabinet memorandum concerning the type of assurances that should be sought from Japan on the treatment of Canadian exports was as follows:

"It could be pointed out to the Japanese at the outset of the negotiations that the proposed extension to them of most-favoured-nation rates represented a major concession, particularly as they reflect the results of negotiations in GATT. In the light of this, and the fact that Japanese imports into Canada would not be liable to any form of discrimination, the Committee consider that we would be justified in asking for similar non-discriminatory treatment of Canadian exports to Japan. This would apply particularly to the 100% surtax on the present tariff duties which the Japanese authorities may, under existing legislation, impose on goods from any country discriminating in any way against Japan. It would apply also to quantitative import restrictions and the allocation of foreign exchange, which are at present being administered by the Japanese on a discriminatory basis. The starting position should probably be to insist on complete non-discrimination between hard and soft currency countries. If the position could not be maintained in the course of negotiations it might be desirable nonetheless to have the principle of non-discrimination spelled out in the agreement with the reservation that, if the Japanese found it necessary to depart from this principle, they would enter into full consultations with us at our request. The last position to which we might move would be to insist at least on the non-discriminatory allocation of exchange among the hard currency countries. The question whether we would be prepared to retreat this far would have to be decided at the time in the light of the progress achieved in the negotiations as a whole."

³⁸ Voir Canada, Recueil des traités, 1954, N° 3/See Canada, Treaty Series, 1954, No. 3.

Agreement was reached on the principle of a valuation procedure consistent with the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and in keeping with the decision of Cabinet of January 30, which would permit, in certain circumstances, the imposition of increased values for duty on imports causing or threatening to cause serious injury to a Canadian domestic industry. For reasons of presentation in Japan, the Japanese requested that the escape clause on valuation should be covered by means of an exchange of notes — which would be published — rather than by way of a formal provision in the Agreement itself. Cabinet approved this procedure at its meeting last October 21. The second Exchange of Notes appended to the Agreement provides this escape clause. The Japanese Note expressly recognises the right of the Canadian Government to resort to special valuation procedures in the circumstances envisaged, both under the bilateral agreement and also after the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade is applied between Canada and Japan.

The Canadian proposal for the unconditional non-discriminatory application of trade and exchange restrictions was not acceptable to the Japanese Government as it considered that the right to impose certain discriminatory trade and exchange restrictions was essential in order to safeguard the external financial position of Japan. In the event a formula was devised, which was approved by Cabinet on October 21, whereby Japan undertook in connection with all of its Trade not to discriminate against Canada in favour of other hard currency sources of supply and in connection with nine important Canadian export products not to impose any trade or exchange controls which have the effect of discriminating in favour of any other country. Article III of the draft agreement provides for the non-discriminatory application of trade and exchange restrictions as between hard currency sources of supply. The third appended exchange of notes provides for unconditional non-discriminatory treatment with respect to the importation into Japan of the nine commodities.

At its meeting on October 21, Cabinet also agreed that existing firm commitments into which the Japanese had already entered for the purchase of any of the nine commodities from other countries, and certain amounts of wheat which Japan proposed to include in agreements currently under negotiation with the Argentine and Turkey, should be exempted from the commitment with respect to the nine commodities. Cabinet also agreed that a general reference to these exceptions should be made in the public exchange of notes but that the precise understanding on these exceptions should be incorporated in an exchange of notes which at the request of the Japanese would remain confidential after the Agreement was signed in order not to prejudice Japan's negotiations with the Argentine and Turkey (see the fourth appended exchange of notes). The Japanese have indicated that should parliamentary or other questions be addressed to their government for more precise information about the exceptions, they would reply that existing and certain arrangements under negotiation with third countries are exempted. Should similar questions be put in Canada we would reply similarly, explaining that only a limited number of the nine commodities are affected and that the exceptions are for specific and limited quantities and for specific periods.

The confidential exchange of Notes also provides that the Japanese Government shall supply relevant information concerning its import licensing and foreign exchange allocation systems in order that the Canadian Government may be in a position to follow the operation of Article III and the exceptions.

As the negotiations have been conducted in Ottawa, the draft Agreement is intended to provide for signature to take place in Ottawa and the exchange of instruments of ratification to take place in Tokyo. Cabinet will wish to consider whether this procedure commends itself. Subject to Cabinet approval it has been tentatively suggested that the Agreement might be signed early in February. The Japanese have indicated that the Agreement would probably be submitted to the Japanese Diet for ratification in early March. Ministers may wish to consider the manner and timing of any discussion of this Agreement in the Canadian Parliament.

Recommendation

It is recommended, with the concurrence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Acting Minister of Finance, that Cabinet:

(a) Approve entry by the Government of Canada into this proposed Agreement on Commerce with Japan; the English and Japanese language texts to be regarded as equally authentic after conformity of the two texts has been verified;

(b) Approve the four supplementary exchanges of Notes in the English language;

(c) Agree that authority be sought of the Governor-in-Council for signature of the Agreement and the related exchanges of notes on behalf of Canada by _____. (to be designated by Cabinet);

(d) Agree that the exchange of notes on the exceptions to the Japanese commitment to accord unconditional most-favoured-nation treatment to the nine commodities should remain confidential documents after publication of the Agreement and the other exchanges of notes;

(e) Agree that an appropriate press release, to be issued in Ottawa at the time of signature of the Agreement, be prepared by the Negotiating Group and be approved by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance;

(f) Agree that the Governor-in-Council be requested to authorise ratification to take effect on the date of the exchange of instruments of ratification with Japan.⁴⁰

PROPOSED U.S. WHEAT AND BARLEY SALES TO JAPAN UNDER SECTION 550
OF THE MUTUAL SECURITY ACT

From the attached telegram (No. 12) which has just been received from our Embassy in Tokyo, it would appear that the proposed purchases of at least 500,000 tons of wheat and 100,000 tons of barley are expected to go through within the next two weeks. In view of the concern with which such a development would be viewed here, a telegram has been sent to our Embassy in Washington indicating that Mr. McIvor of the Wheat Board and Dr. Isbister of the Department of Trade and Commerce will be in Washington for talks with U.S. officials on Thursday and Friday. A copy of this telegram is also attached for your information.

2. I understand it to be Mr. Howe's view that, despite this situation, he would be agreeable to action by Cabinet tomorrow on the projected Traded Agreement between Canada and Japan. The fate of that Agreement might, of course, be affected by what happens eventually concerning this proposed transaction.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Attention M.W. Sharp, Trade and Commerce, from Britton, Begins: Oda of Japanese Foreign Office advised me this morning that Japan intends purchasing 500,000 tons of wheat and 100,000 tons of barley from the United States under the provisions of Section 550 of the Mutual Security Act. It is anticipated that an agreement for the purchase will be concluded before the end of January.

2. Japanese Government does not regard these purchases as discriminatory nor in conflict with the projected agreement on commerce between Canada and Japan and will cable Iguchi in these terms. Oda contends that the wheat under the agreement will be made available to Japan at a price 20 percent below the IWA price and the barley at a similar discount and, therefore, is being purchased from the cheapest source of supply.

3. Oda was reminded, in the terms of Mr. Howe's letter of January 8 to the Japanese Ambassador, that the Canadian Government would regard this purchase as discriminatory and that it would probably affect the volume of Canada's sales of both wheat and barley to Japan during the present year. Oda conceded that Canada's grain sales would be affected and intimated that the United States Government have recently been pressing Japan to increase purchases of wheat and barley from the United States.

4. The transaction will be in yen so that Japan will not be required to use accumulated dollar holdings. 20 percent of the yen proceeds from the sale of the grains is to be in the form of a grant which will be utilized for the development of Japan's munitions industry. The balance of 80 percent for United States off-shore military procurement.

5. It is probable that additional purchases of wheat and barley under the same terms and conditions will be made by Japan from the United States to bring the total value of the purchases to 50,000,000 dollars (Figure of $50,000,000 (received corrupt) could possibly be $50,900,000.), the figure frequently reported in the local press.

6. Oda also commented on the wheat contract with Canada stating that the food agency does not favour a rigid contract because of losses sustained under the previous contract as a result of the strike on the West Coast. Ends.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Attention Sharp, Trade and Commerce, from Britton, Begins: Had interview today with Waring, Commercial Councillor at United States Embassy, during which he outlined his views on the forthcoming grain sales to Japan under section 550 of MSA. Waring has been fully informed by the Japanese Government on the Canadian Government's attitude to these transactions and has seen copy of Mr. Howe's letter of January 8. Waring stated in the discussions which he conducted with the Japanese Government on MSA purchases that Canada's position was kept continually in mind by both the negotiating parties. Waring advises there was no intention of interfering with normal Canadian wheat sales to Japan and he confirmed Japan's intention to purchase 600,000 tons of wheat from Canada during the present crop year. This quantity is inclusive of purchases already made. The Japanese Government furthermore have expressed to Waring their intention to purchase not less than the same quantity of wheat from Canada in the next crop year. It is contended by the Japanese that contemplated wheat purchases from Canada during the present and next crop year will be well above quantity purchased in the previous crop year. The Japanese informed Waring that the contemplated purchases of grains under section 550 of MSA does not in their opinion violate the principle of non discrimination expressed in the Canada/Japan commercial agreement and their note in reply to Mr. Howe's letter will be couched in these terms. The Japanese Foreign Office according to Waring are giving serious attention to the protest lodged by Mr. Howe and I gathered that the United States Embassy here are also seriously concerned. Neither the United States Embassy in Tokyo nor the Japanese Government consciously felt that the purchase of this wheat under section 550 was in conflict with principle of non-discrimination. The Japanese Government are extremely anxious to avoid any controversy which would delay the signing of the commercial agreement with Canada and I should think that the present issue could be utilized to advantage in obtaining a wheat contract with Japan covering the quantities of wheat already mentioned if this is desired. Ends.

Ottawa, January 22, 1954

My dear Minister,

With reference to your letter of January 8, 1954, under instruction from Tokyo, I wish to convey the following views of the Japanese Government on the subject under reference.

The purchase of United States wheat and barley under the provisions of Section 550 of the Mutual Security Act, contemplated by my Government, have certain aspects which should perhaps be explained.

Section 550 stipulates that special precautions shall be taken to safeguard against the substitution or displacement of usual marketings of the United States or friendly countries.

My Government is fully aware of the importance of the above stipulation, and has no intention of "serious curtailment or temporary elimination of Canadian sales of wheat and barley to Japan", as mentioned in your Note of January 8, 1954.

Japanese wheat purchases from Canada for Japanese fiscal year 1953-54 will total roughly 600 thousand tons; barley purchases, roughly 340 thousand tons. My Government anticipates the purchase of roughly the same amount for the coming fiscal year.

Purchases under Section 550 will be made in the following manner:

(1) The price of wheat will be the same as the prevailing IWA price and that for barley the prevailing United States export price.

(2) The dollar funds necessary for purchase under Section 550 will be reimbursed to Japan by the Foreign Operations Administration.

(3) The yen equivalent of twenty per cent of the total purchase funds will be given Japan in the form of grants-in-aid for the development of Japanese industry.

(4) The yen equivalent of the remainder of the total purchase funds will be used for off-shore procurement of military equipment and ammunition in Japan for use by Japan and other friendly forces in the Far East.

For the above reasons, my Government is convinced that purchases under Section 550, which are not on a strictly commercial basis, will not conflict with the principles of the projected agreement on commerce between Canada and Japan.

Yours sincerely,
S. IGUCHI

PROPOSED UNITED STATES WHEAT AND BARLEY SALES TO JAPAN
UNDER SECTION 550 MUTUAL SECURITY ACT

Isbister and McIvor had successful meetings yesterday morning with Kalijarvi and other State Department officials and officials from CCC, Department of Agriculture, and FOA. LePan and Smith accompanied Isbister to this meeting. Subsequent to the meeting a more restricted meeting was held with Sam Waugh, Kalijarvi, Schaetzel and Vernon of the State Department.

2. The State Department went to some pains to explain that they were most anxious to put through a military assistance agreement with the Japanese that would enable them to slowly build up the Japanese defence forces for a strictly defensive role. They explained that there was considerable opposition in Japan to any expenditures for military purposes. At the same time Japanese economy had run through a period of extreme inflation and the present Minister of Finance was making a real effort to bring this under control. This could only be accomplished provided budget expenditures were reduced to a minimum. Nevertheless they had agreed that it was essential to increase military expenditures but they could only obtain support of the Diet provided they could indicate some compensation for this increased military expenditure. The only way the United States could see a way to help the Japanese in this predicament was an operation under 550.

3. FOA then described the basis under which they have been negotiating with the Japanese that follows very closely that described in your EX-97 of January 20† with the important exception that there is no, repeat no, reduction in price beyond regular IWA and current market prices. It was evident that FOA has not kept State Department fully informed of the progress of these negotiations but FOA did confirm, in answer to Kalijarvi's question, that no firm proposal had yet been received from the Japanese.

4. The Canadian side's point of view was first expressed by McIvor who read out the telegram received from Tokyo as given to us in your teletype EX-97. Isbister went on to explain that we did not wish to complain about American aid to Japan and that we had the same objectives in wishing to see Japanese economy strengthened and their acceptance of an increased share of their defence costs. It was for this reason that we were anxious to conclude the trade agreement which would make it possible for the Japanese to sell considerably more of their produce in Canada by extending to them the advantages of our most favoured nation tariff rates. At the same time we had felt, based on the information received from Japan, that we stood in grave danger of losing our position in the Japanese market for sales of wheat and barley. We made it plain that we had no wish to seek a preferred position in the Japanese market but we did insist upon having an equal opportunity for legitimate business. We pointed out also that our proposed trade agreement with Japan was based on principles of non-discrimination, which the American Government had supported; indeed some of their officials at Geneva had seen this agreement and had given their full support to the principles contained therein.

5. The Department of Agriculture asked if it would be possible to include any 550 wheat in a deal with Japan that we might consider as not interfering with Canada's legitimate trade with that country. They asked if we could give them an indication of what volume of wheat we might consider as our legitimate share of the market. They went on to say that they hoped that the interpretation of "all normal marketing of wheat by free countries" would not be construed so as to mean the quantity of wheat that Canada would otherwise sell this year if no 550 operations were to take place. It was hoped that the interpretation we might give to this phrase would be the amount of wheat that we would normally sell to Japan, allowing 550 wheat to come in to the extent that might be considered necessary to take the place of the poor rice crop this year.

6. McIvor answered that we could not name a figure and that we were also concerned that any arrangements for sales with the Japanese could provide continuity of shipments so as not to cause irregularity in shipments out of Vancouver. It was felt that our next step should be to discuss the matter further with the Japanese and to ask them what they were prepared to do. It would be pointed out to them that they were not being offered wheat below the IWA price and that consequently we could not accept the principle that they had the right to discriminate against imports from Canada. The United States agreed also that they should advise the Japanese concerning the price situation and also to suggest that they did not wish to interfere with the proposed Canadian-Japanese trade agreement.

7. Following the meeting, State Department have subsequently advised us that they have telegraphed to Tokyo outlining the basis of our talks and to make quite clear to the Japanese that there is no offer of wheat below the IWA prices.

8. The meeting was conducted on a most friendly and cooperative atmosphere. Subsequently the talks with Waugh were on an equally friendly basis. In those talks Isbister went into more detail concerning our proposed trade agreement, and there was no doubt that Waugh will give his personal backing to the line of approach worked out at the first meeting. Isbister will be in Ottawa by train Saturday morning and will of course give you any amplifying details.

[Ottawa], January 28, 1954

My dear Ambassador,

Thank you for your letter of January 22 in which you convey the Japanese Government's view regarding the contemplated purchases of wheat and barley by Japan from the United States under the provisions of Section 550 of the Mutual Security Act.

I wish to make it clear again that, in the view of the Canadian Government, any such purchase by Japan, for which Canadian suppliers are not granted an equal opportunity of competing, would be inconsistent with the principles of unconditional non-discrimination which occupy a position of central importance in the projected agreement on commerce between Canada and Japan. Under the terms of this agreement, purchases of wheat and barley would have to be based on strictly commercial considerations, regardless of the particular currency used and regardless of any ancillary conditions of purchase. There should be no misunderstanding between our two governments in this matter.

At the same time, I wish to assure you that the Canadian Government fully understands and sympathizes with Japan's present difficulties and we recognize the importance of strengthening the Japanese economy. We do not wish to stand in the way of Japan receiving aid or special assistance from the United States.

We have, therefore, examined the present position in the hope of finding a solution for the specific problem that has arisen with respect to the particular purchases under the Mutual Security Act now being discussed between Japan and the United States. The Canadian Government wishes to find a solution which will safeguard the continuing commercial flow of Canadian wheat and barley to Japan. In the case of wheat, we note that Japan has been obtaining about ten cargoes per month from Canada, and we have every reason to believe that under normal commercial conditions Japan would continue to take at least that quantity from Canada during the coming months. We would propose, therefore, that arrangements be made for the continuation of shipments at this level during the balance of the present Canadian crop year and the coming crop year, i.e. to the end of July, 1955, to assure the movement of Canadian wheat in the face of these particular special arrangements with the United States. The Canadian Wheat Board would now be prepared to negotiate with the Japanese authorities on this basis for wheat contracts covering this period. In the case of barley, it is felt that Japan's purchases from Canada under competitive conditions would be at a level of about 50 percent of Japanese total imports, or a minimum amount of about 350,000 tons annually, which is about the figure mentioned in your letter of January 22, and it is our proposal that contracts be made for barley to this extent at the same time. It is understood, of course, that Canada would be prepared to undertake to supply the wheat and barley under the proposed contracts at market prices for Canadian grain at time of shipment.

I hope that these proposals may serve to resolve the present difficulties to the mutual satisfaction of our two countries.

Yours sincerely,
[C.D. HOWE]

Sir,

Thank you for your letter of January 26th addressed to my predecessor in which you proposed a practical approach to solve the problem which has arisen with respect to the relationship between the projected purchases by Japan of wheat and barley from the United States under the terms of Section 550 of the Mutual Security Act and the terms of the Agreement on Commerce between Japan and Canada.

I wish to inform you that the Japanese Government, with a view to assuring the Canadian Government of continued flow of Canadian wheat and barley to Japan at a normal level in the face of the special arrangements with the United States, will take necessary measures within its power to ensure purchase, through commercial channels, of Canadian wheat and barley in the amounts and for the periods as specified below, at selling prices for Canadian wheat and barley on a competitive basis, provided that the said Japan-Canada Agreement on Commerce comes into force in the near future:

(a) During the period from February 25th to July 31st, 1954, inclusive:

Canadian wheat of 200,000 tons or approximate, and Canadian barley of 50,000 tons or approximate.

(b) During the next Canadian crop year, August 1954 to July 1955, inclusive:

Canadian wheat of 550,000 tons and Canadian barley of 300,000 tons, as a minimum, the purchase of which will be spread out as evenly as feasible on a quarterly basis.

Your Excellency:

Thank you for your letter dated March 31st advising that your Government is prepared to take the necessary measures to ensure the purchase by Japan of Canadian wheat and barley in the minimum quantities as indicated during the balance of the present crop year and during the next crop year. I note that your Government's undertaking is conditional upon the coming into force in the near future of the agreement on commerce between Japan and Canada.

Your Government's proposals are acceptable as an undertaking of the minimum quantities which will be purchased by Japan to maintain the continued flow of Canadian wheat and barley to Japan at a normal level in the face of the special arrangements with the United States. I hope that actual purchases will exceed the minimum quantities as undertaken.

May I suggest that it will be helpful to the Canadian Wheat Board, and I believe to the Japanese Government, if the purchases can be made as much in advance of the shipping periods as possible, so that the Japanese requirements may be programmed in a manner acceptable to both buyer and seller.

DECLARATION OF THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE CONCERNING THE APPLICATION OF THE GENERAL AGREEMENT TO COMMERCIAL RELATIONS BETWEEN THE CONTRACTING PARTIES AND JAPAN

The Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade at the Eighth Session, which was held in Geneva from September 17 to October 27, 1953, adopted and opened for acceptance a Declaration whereby, pending tariff negotiations with Japan for her accession, the commercial relations between any contracting party in a position to accept the Declaration and Japan would be governed by the provisions of GATT.⁴² This Memorandum seeks Cabinet approval for the Government of Canada to enter into the Declaration.

The arrangements which were made with respect to Japan at the last GATT Session provided for Japan to participate in GATT on a provisional basis pending tariff negotiations. By a Decision taken at the Session, Japan was invited to participate in the meetings and the work of the Contracting Parties. The Declaration to which reference is made above provides for the application of the General Agreement to commercial relations between Contracting Parties and Japan. To date the Declaration has been accepted by 23 of the Contracting Parties.

Cabinet decided at its meeting on October 21, 1953 that the Canadian Delegation to GATT should indicate that Canada would be prepared to consider the application of the General Agreement between Canada and Japan as soon as a bilateral agreement was ratified and on the understanding that the bilateral agreement would prevail in any respect in which it was not specifically provided for in the GATT. In accordance with these instructions the Canadian representative at the GATT Session stated: "The Contracting Parties are aware, I think, that Canada and Japan are currently engaged in negotiating a trade agreement, consistent with GATT, and designed to place commercial relations between our two countries on a stable and mutually advantageous basis. We are hopeful that it will prove possible soon to conclude a satisfactory agreement. In this event, and subject to the terms of such an agreement, the Canadian Government will then be in a position to give serious consideration to entering into an arrangement with Japan whereby the GATT will govern our commercial relations."

In line with this policy the Prime Minister indicated in his speech in Tokyo on March 11th "We were happy to join with other countries in welcoming Japan to the meetings of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. With the completion of action on the commercial agreement between our two countries, we would expect to be in a position to apply the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to our trading relations."

As the Agreement on Commerce was signed on March 31st Cabinet may therefore now wish to approve that when our bilateral agreement with Japan is ratified Canada should enter into the Declaration. It is anticipated that early action towards ratification will be taken by Japan. If Cabinet approves this course of action, the Executive Secretary of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade will be notified of acceptance of the Declaration by the Government of Canada as soon as the instruments of ratification are exchanged.

Recommendations

Accordingly, with the concurrence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance, I respectfully recommend that:

"(a) Cabinet approve the acceptance by the Government of Canada of the Declaration of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade Concerning the Application of the General Agreement to Commercial Relations between the Contracting Parties and Japan; and

(b) An Order-in-Council be issued, along the lines of the attached Submission,† granting authority to execute and deposit, on behalf of the Government of Canada, an Instrument of Acceptance of this Declaration, it being understood that Canada's acceptance will be subject to the provisions of the Agreement on Commerce between Canada and Japan of March 31, 1954, and that the Instrument of Acceptance will not be deposited until this Agreement has been ratified."⁴³

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

1. From 1900 to 1905 the Japanese Government prohibited immigration to Canada but in 1906 our adherence to the Treaty of 1894 between Great Britain and Japan brought about a substantial increase in immigration, details of which are attached.⁴⁴ A secret agreement with Japan was made in 1907,⁴⁵ a further agreement in 1923,⁴⁶ and a new arrangement in 1928.⁴⁷ The latter provided for 150 immigrants of Japanese nationality of certain defined classes (details attached), in addition to P.C. 2115, i.e., at that time wives or children under 18 years of age of Canadian citizens resident in Canada who were British subjects under Canadian law. This agreement was automatically terminated by the outbreak of war in 1941 and has not been renewed by the Peace Treaty.

2. By P.C. 10773 of November 26, 1942,⁴⁸ certain Canadian citizens by birth or naturalization who departed from Canada for Japan in an exchange of nationals were deprived of their citizenship status, and by P.C. 7355 and P.C. 7356 of December 15, 1945, other Canadian citizens by naturalization were deprived of their citizenship status. A total of 3964 persons were repatriated under these 3 P.C.'s. By P.C. 3689 of July 31, 1952, the Enemy Aliens Order was rescinded so that immigration from Japan is now governed by P.C. 2115 of September 16, 1932, which applies to all persons of Asian origin.

3. P.C. 2115 now provides for the admission of the wife, husband or unmarried children under 21 years of age of any Canadian citizen legally admitted to and resident in Canada who is in a position to receive and care for his dependents. In the case of Chinese, this has been extended in special cases on compassionate grounds to 25 years. Agreements have been signed with India, Pakistan and Ceylon to provide for the admission of 150-100-50 respectively, in addition to wives, husbands and minor children under 21 of Canadian citizens resident in Canada who are in a position to receive and care for them.

⁴⁷ Voir/See Volume 4, Documents 831-836.

⁴⁸ Voir/See Volume 10, Document 918.

4. Therefore, the following groups and classes of persons in Japan, or elsewhere, of Japanese origin are to be considered with respect to immigration:

(a) Canadian citizens who are now in Japan:

(i) Persons who were in Japan at the outbreak of the war;

(ii) Canadian-born minor children of Japanese parents; these children do not lose their status by the P.C.'s above referred to and are, therefore, admissible as natural-born Canadians.

It has been estimated that there are at least 3,000 to 4,000 natural born Canadians in Japan and that many of them have married so that the total number admissible may run to 10,000.

Under the Immigration Act Canadian citizens are admissible as a matter of right and entry, therefore, cannot be refused. It would seem that on humanitarian grounds we should allow them to bring their families with them providing satisfactory arrangements can be made for care and maintenance in Canada; notwithstanding the regulations require the applicant to be a resident of Canada.

(b) Persons who had domicile in Canada and who were in Japan at the outbreak of the war. It is assumed that most of them would have lost their Canadian domicile but there may be some cases where a claim is made that Canadian domicile has been retained; each of those cases will have to be studied on its own merit.

(c) Persons admissible under P.C. 2115 not included in the above. The numbers in this category would depend chiefly on whether Japanese Canadians will continue the custom of returning to Japan for marriage when travel facilities to that country are established. There may be a small number of applications from persons now in Canada.

(d) Canadian citizens who served in the enemy armed forces. There are 32 known cases in this category and these are included in (a). At the Cabinet meeting of July 31st, it was agreed that passports may henceforward be issued to Canadian citizens of Japanese race notwithstanding the fact that they served in enemy forces; it being understood that if an examination of his war record proved any such person to be clearly undesirable every effort would be made to prevent his return to Canada.

5. It would, therefore, seem that there are between 10,000 and 12,000 people of Japanese origin who by reason of birth in Canada, or by reason of being an immediate close relative of Canadian citizens of Japanese origin, are now admissible. Consideration must, therefore, be given as to the facilities to be provided for the processing of those now admissible and of what other arrangements, if any, are to be made with the Japanese Government for the admission of other classes.

6. It is to be assumed that it would be the desire of the Japanese Government that the 1928 agreement should be revived. A case could be made for doing it in our interests to show the Japanese authorities that we are not discriminating against them, and to regulate the flow when the time comes for normal immigration. However, a case can be made against it in that we would be making an exception to P.C. 2115 in favour of our former enemies, placing the Japanese people in the same category as those of Pakistan, India and Ceylon, and preferred to those from China and every other Asian country now covered by P.C. 2115.

7. It is felt that admission should be refused to those who were voluntarily repatriated and lost their citizenship and domicile, unless, of course, they are otherwise admissible under 2115. On the other hand, it is felt that admission cannot be refused to the natural born or naturalized (with their wives and children) who were out of Canada at the outbreak of the war. We should also allow the return to Canada of those who returned to Japan since the war but have not lost their citizenship under P.C. 7355 and 7356 of 1945. Neither would it be advisable to delay the admission of the wives and children of Canadian citizens residing in Canada.

8. In view of the fact that prior to the war with Japan immigration of Japanese was administered under bilateral agreement, it is to be expected that the Japanese Government will press for a similar agreement now and, therefore, we should be prepared to negotiate such an agreement, but it would appear advisable to delay the conclusion of such agreement for some time and it could be explained to the Japanese authorities that it is essential from a Canadian point of view that we dispose of the 10,000 to 12,000 people who would now be entitled to admission to Canada under present regulations.

9. It is to be noted that Chinese immigration reached a peak last year of 2,708 and that in 1952 about 2,300 will be admitted. It is expected that Chinese immigration will decline further next year unless the admissible classes are widened, which appears unlikely. It is estimated that, for the next five years, unless conditions change in China or unless changes are made in the regulations, immigration from China will be of about 1800 per year. Although the Chinese population is spread throughout Canada the largest group, about 30% reside in British Columbia. British Columbia receives annually from 600 to 800 new Chinese immigrants. Prior to the last war practically all the Japanese in Canada were residing in British Columbia. However, during the war, for security reasons, they have been moved to the Prairie Provinces and Ontario. According to the 1951 Census, the Japanese population in British Columbia is 7,169 while the total population of Japanese in Canada is 21,663. It is to be expected that those who would be admissible as close relatives will join relatives where they reside in Canada. On the other hand, Canadians of Japanese extraction who may return from Japan will, in all probability, return to British Columbia. As for those who may be admitted under an agreement, past experience would suggest that they would establish themselves in British Columbia. As it would appear unwise to contemplate the admission of more than 3,000 Chinese and Japanese annually in that province, it is, therefore, an additional reason for deferring as long as possible the signing of an agreement with the Japanese Government along the lines of the one existing prior to the second World War.

On the initiative of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Cabinet reviewed in general terms on January 14 a year-old paper outlining some of the difficulties now encountered by Canadian citizens of Japanese origin and their families desiring to return to Canada from Japan. Cabinet directed that in applying the terms of P.C. 2115 of September 16, 1932, this should be done in such a way that it would not result in any sudden large movement which might be opposed in certain parts of Canada. Although no official approach had been made by the Japanese Government, Cabinet was aware of the probable desire of the Japanese Government for prestige reasons to overcome present exclusion of Japanese immigrants to Canada other than those Canadian citizens covered under P.C. 2115, their wives and children. Cabinet directed that this whole question should be studied by the Departments concerned. It is not expected that a report will be made for some time. You may wish to enquire from the Prime Minister about further particulars of Cabinet's discussion.

ECONOMIC MEETING OF THE ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES TO BE HELD IN RIO DE JANEIRO IN NOVEMBER, 1954; PROPOSAL FOR CANADIAN PARTICIPATION AS AN OBSERVER

I. Introduction

1. The Canadian Embassy in Washington informed the Department of External Affairs by letter No. 942 of March 28 [sic] (copy attached as Annex "A") of an enquiry by officials of the United States State Department as to whether Canada was interested in being represented in some way at the Economic Meeting of the Organization of American States to be held in Rio de Janeiro in November. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has also received a personal letter dated August 24, 1954,[†] from Mr. John Foster Dulles, in which it is suggested that the Economic Conference at Rio could be of considerable importance to Canada and that he, Mr. Dulles, wonders whether the Canadian Government would be open to an invitation.

II. Background

2. At the Tenth Inter-American Conference of the Organization of American States, held at Caracas, Venezuela, in March, 1954, it was agreed that consideration of major economic problems would be deferred until a special economic conference was held in Rio de Janeiro during the last quarter of 1954. The main reason for this deferment is said to be that the United States' administration's foreign economic policy, in particular towards Latin America, had not yet been approved by the United States Congress. The Rio Conference will be the first major economic conference held under the auspices of the Organization of American States. The tentative agenda for the Rio meeting contains the following main items:

(a) Prices of raw material

- (b) Tariffs and trade restrictions
- (c) Technical assistance and financial co-operation in economic developments
- (d) Hemispheric trade

III. Problem

3. Should Canada accept an invitation to attend the Rio Conference with the status of observer? It is difficult to answer this question without giving consideration first to the fundamental problem of Canadian relations with the Inter-American system, and to a policy of closer relations with Latin America.

IV. Considerations

For:

4. The Conference is taking place in the country in which Canadian investments are the greatest and which is Canada's largest export market in Latin America. As hosts, the Brazilians would attach particular importance to Canadian attendance.

5. The main items on the agenda of the Rio Conference would seem to have some interest to Canada, mainly, "tariffs and trade restrictions" and "hemispheric trade". Discussions under the item "financial co-operation in economic developments" might possibly also have some bearing on the position of such Canadian interests as the Brazilian Traction.

6. At the Rio Conference, it has been said, important decisions will be taken which will have a significant bearing on the conditions under which trade will be carried on in the hemisphere and which may affect development of Canadian economic and commercial relations with Latin America.

7. The status of observer does not impose the necessity for any action by Canada at the Conference.

8. There exists a keen interest in various departments of the Canadian Government in obtaining firsthand information on the problems to be discussed.

Against:

9. The presence of a Canadian observer at the Rio Conference is not indispensable in order to obtain firsthand information on the Rio Conference. The meetings are held in public and the Canadian Embassy in Rio is well situated to perform this function.

10. Though the terminology of the main points indicated on the agenda for the Rio Conference seem to indicate broad discussions, it would follow that a regional organization would treat the subjects in a regional manner. The Canadian Government policy has been to deal with such problems on a broad and more general basis. In any case, most of the issues to be debated at the Rio Conference, such as trade and tariff policies, commodity agreements, position of under-developed countries, will be the subject of intensive discussions under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and possibly the International Monetary Fund when currency convertibility and revised trade rules are expected to be considered in coming months.

11. In view of the soundings made by certain Latin American countries as to Canada's intentions towards the Organization of American States and the many expressions of desire to see Canada share more actively in the work of the O.A.S. Canadian attendance at the Rio Conference would be interpreted as an intimation of Canada's interest in establishing closer relations with the O.A.S. and might well precipitate a formal invitation to join this organization. The Canadian Ambassador in Rio de Janeiro, who was consulted on this matter, feels that Canadian attendance at the Rio meeting would inevitably result in an invitation to join the Organization of American States. (See attached despatch No. 369 of June 24, 1954, Annex "B").

V. Conclusion

12. Unless the Canadian Government is prepared to re-consider its policy towards the Organization of American States (the present Canadian policy is outlined in Annex "C"), with such commercial, financial and political implications as may be involved, it is suggested that it may not necessarily be in the Canadian interest from an economic point of view to accept an invitation to attend the Economic Meeting at Rio. On the other hand, the time may have come for the Canadian Government to consider revising its policy towards the O.A.S.: Developments of very considerable significance have taken place since the last submission to Cabinet in 1947, not only in Canada's relations with Latin America, but also in the importance of the countries of Latin America in world affairs, particularly at the United Nations. United States policy towards Latin America is now more co-operative and flexible, thus reducing the possibility of friction; Canadian trade has increased more than fifteen-fold, but competition, particularly from continental European countries, is becoming keener; the importance of retaining the good-will of Latin American countries in the cold war is not negligible.

O.A.S. ECONOMIC MEETING IN RIO DE JANEIRO

During the course of one of our regular meetings at the State Department we were asked by Hayden Raynor whether the Canadian Government wish to consider being represented in some way at the Economic Meeting of the Organization of American States to be held in Rio de Janeiro in November. Raynor pointed out that Mr. Pearson and Mr. Howe had made incidental references to this meeting when they were in Washington in March, and while it was realized that no direct suggestion was made for Canadian representation, it has occurred to the State Department that the Canadian Government might wish to consider the possibility.

2. Ambassador Bowen, who is the United States representative on the Inter-American Social and Economic Council, was present during this conversation and indicated some of the main items on the agenda for the November meeting. They are as follows:

- (i) Prices of raw material;
- (ii) Tariffs and trade restrictions;
- (iii) Technical assistance and financial co-operation in economic development;
- (iv) Hemispheric trade.

He also suggested that if the Canadian authorities wish to raise the subject at all, it might be well to do this to the Brazilian Government since initiatives from the United States Government in the O.A.S. were inclined to be regarded with suspicion.

3. Looking over the summary record of the meeting of the Joint United States-Canadian Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs, we are inclined to feel that the references to the Rio meeting are quite indirect as far as Canada is concerned.¹ However, we made no comment on the State Department suggestion other than to say that we were sure the Canadian authorities would appreciate the suggestion that they have the opportunity of considering the possibility of attending in the capacity of an observer. It was drawn to our attention that the presence of a Canadian observer would require an alternation in the terms of reference in the Social and Economic Council. We did, however, get the impression that the United States authorities would welcome a suggestion for Canadian representation.

4. We should be glad to have your instructions on what we should say further in this connection. There is, of course, no suggestion of other than oral communications.

O.A.S. ECONOMIC MEETING IN RIO DE JANEIRO

When I wrote on June 14th that I would like to wait until after the Rio economic conference before giving you our views on the advisability of joining the O.A.S., I had in mind that the conference would present the best opportunity we have ever had to learn how the Organization functions in the general area in which our interest is greatest and where our contribution is likely to be the most significant. Further, the agenda contains specific issues of immediate concern to us — tariffs and trade restrictions, hemispheric trade, and financial cooperation in economic development. When we see how the Organization tackles these problems we might be able to determine once and for all whether there was a place in it for us.

2. I see little in favour of accepting the U.S. suggestion to attend in the status of an observer. If we attend any O.A.S. meeting as an observer we are as good as committed to join the organization, for I do not see how we could refuse the invitation to join which would inevitably soon be forthcoming without giving deep offense: a refusal to join after observing would say in effect that we did not like what we had seen. If we are to enter the O.A.S. let us enter it as a member and reap the advantage of full membership boldly assumed. I see no point in crawling in through an observership particularly if I am right in thinking that we couldn't crawl out.

3. The risk we run in refusing to attend the economic meeting as an observer is that something will happen at the conference to hurt us which we would be able as an observer to prevent. I think this risk is negligible for there is little we could do as an observer at the coming meeting to prevent anything, particularly since it would be our first appearance in strange surroundings. Positions on the main issues are entrenched and strongly held, and I doubt if the force of suasion we could bring to bear indirectly would be of any avail. Observership would merely involve us to some degree and commit us to joining the O.A.S. without giving us the compensation of being able to protect our interests at the meeting.

4. I would be inclined to tell the Americans that we are re-examining the question of joining the O.A.S. If we do join we would prefer to begin our association as a member, not as an observer. In re-examining our position, what happens at the Rio conference will be of the greatest interest to us and we would appreciate being kept as fully in the picture as their busy delegation would find it possible to do. I think we are reasonably well equipped here to follow the conference if we can get cooperation of this sort from the Americans. If, as I assume, the "Ambassador Bowen" mentioned in the letter is Mervin H. Bohan, and if he heads up the delegation to Rio, as is likely, I think it would work. I know him well. If you do adopt my suggestion, our people in Washington might try to have Bohan present when they see Raynor again. (Bohan, in a speech in Los Angeles on May 20th, said: "I think the system of Inter-American conferences and meetings is a mechanism which is still not well understood or appreciated in the United States." If the public of the leading member nation is ignorant, our own uncertainties might be forgiven us).

5. I see there might be some domestic political gain in being able to say that we had an observer present, but this, I feel, is due to a misconception of what an observer can do. So long as we are not members of the O.A.S. we cannot protect our interests, whatever they are. It is the question of membership that we need to settle, and can best settle, I feel, after the meeting.

[ANNEXE "C"/ANNEX "C"]

NoteMemorandum

[Ottawa, n.d.]

The most recent official statement on Canada's policy concerning participation in the Organization of American States was made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on March 27, 1953. He mentioned that the position of the Government of Canada had not changed since he had last referred to this subject on February 12, 1949, when speaking at a press conference in Washington. On that occasion he said:

"Our Government has been giving thought to the Pan American Union over a great many years and our relations with the members of the Pan American Union . . . have always been most satisfactory. The angle from which this has been examined is as to whether our actual participation in the Pan American Union would be productive of any real advantage for any of its members. Our cultural, our trade relations, with other members of the Pan American Union have always been very good and they will improve constantly. So far it has not appeared to us that there would be any decided advantage in a formal membership in the Pan American Union . . . At the present time, we consider it much more urgent to bring about this North Atlantic Union than to extend one that might be regarded as exclusive for the Western Hemisphere."

2. Canada's position had previously been stated by Mr. King in the House of Commons on August 4, 1944; his statement contained the following points:

(i) A prerequisite of any action by Canada would be an invitation from the present members to join;

(ii) Canadian participation in such an organization should be based only upon a wide general appreciation in Canada of the organization's purposes and responsibilities.

Mr. King did not believe that such an appreciation existed then and a Gallup Poll conducted in June, 1947, revealed that the situation remained unchanged. 70% of the persons polled knew nothing of the Pan American Union.

3. A memorandum dated October 14, 1947, dealing with Canadian participation in the O.A.S., was submitted to the Cabinet.² The memorandum recommended that, on balance, it would be advisable for Canada to defer at that time any decision to establish closer ties with the inter-American system. However, decision with respect to this memorandum was deferred by the Cabinet.

4. The Government is not convinced that membership in the Organization of American States would benefit Canada or improve its situation to a degree corresponding to the effort involved. Also, it is doubtful that under present circumstances — particularly in the light of the current defence effort — Canada could make a substantial contribution to the O.A.S.

5. There does not seem to be any pressing reason which should prompt the Canadian Government at the present time to change this attitude towards the inter-American system. Economically, however, Canada is becoming more interested in Latin America and it may well be that this eventually will require participation in the O.A.S., the major organ of relationship between the twenty-one republics of the Western Hemisphere.

ECONOMIC CONFERENCE OF THE ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES,
NOV. 1954; IMPLICATIONS OF CANADIAN ATTENDANCE

41. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, said an inquiry had been made by the U.S. State Department as to whether Canada was interested in being represented at the economic meeting of the Organization of American States to be held in Rio de Janeiro in November. In addition, he had received a personal letter from the U.S. Secretary of State suggesting that the Conference could be of considerable importance to Canada. Mr. Dulles wondered whether Canada would welcome an invitation. At the 10th Inter-American Conference of the Organization of American States, held earlier in the year, it had been agreed that major economic problems would be considered at a special conference during the last quarter of 1954. The reason for this was said to be that the U.S. administration's foreign economic policy, particularly towards Latin America, had not yet been approved by Congress.

The agenda of the Rio Conference would include such items as prices of raw materials, tariffs and trade restrictions, technical assistance and financial co-operation in economic development, and hemispheric trade. The arguments for having a representative at the meeting included the nature of the agenda, containing items of considerable interest to Canada, the belief that the Brazilians would attach particular importance to Canadian attendance in Rio and the claim that important decisions would be taken which would have a significant bearing on the conditions under which trade would be carried out in the western hemisphere. There was a keen interest in various departments in obtaining first-hand information on the problems to be discussed. The status of observer would not require any action by Canada at the conference.

On the other hand, the presence of an invited Canadian observer was not essential to obtain first-hand information about the conference, and many of the subjects to be discussed would be considered at forthcoming meetings of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and of the International Monetary Fund. Canadian attendance could be interpreted as an indication of Canada's growing interest in the Organization of American States and might well lead to a formal invitation to join.

Unless the government was prepared to reconsider its policy towards the Organization it appeared, on balance, not to be in Canada's interest to accept the invitation. However, significant developments had occurred in Canada's relations with Latin America in recent years. U.S. policy towards the countries in the area was now more co-operative and flexible and the importance of obtaining their goodwill in the cold war was not negligible.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Sept. 4, 1954 — Cab. Doc. 195-54).

42. In the course of discussion the following points emerged:

(a) It was probable that the U.S. interest in Canada's attendance was motivated by a desire for support in resisting proposals likely to be made for economic aid and assistance.

(b) If the invitation to attend as an observer were accepted, it was likely that there would be increasing pressure for Canada to accept a formal invitation to join the organization.

(c) While the Canadian Ambassador in Brazil had indicated, earlier in the year, that he did not think it advisable to attend in the status of an observer, he had now changed his mind and felt that such a status would produce better reporting of the proceedings than would otherwise be possible.

(d) The relations between Canada and Latin American nations were increasing in scope and importance. Trade had grown and prospects for further expansion in this field were bright; more and more students were being exchanged. Within Canada, there were feelings in some quarters that the government was not as concerned with this organization as it was with others composed in large measure of English speaking, Protestant nations.

(e) If the invitation was accepted, any undue prominence which might be attached to Canada's participation at the Conference could be avoided by designating our Ambassador to Brazil as Canada's Observer. At a later stage the whole question of Canada's future association with the organization would probably have to be discussed, as an acceptance might well be followed up by suggestions that Canada accept full membership.

43. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning the approach which had been made about an invitation to attend the Economic Meeting of the Organization of American States, to be held in Rio de Janeiro, in November, and agreed that an invitation to attend this meeting could be accepted and that arrangements should be made for the Canadian Ambassador to Brazil to act as Canadian observer at the Conference.

ECONOMIC MEETING OF THE OAS IN RIO

We had two conversations this week with the State Department on the forthcoming ministerial meeting of the OAS Inter-American Economic and Social Council to be held in Rio. We discussed at the first meeting, held with members of the office of regional American affairs, United States positions on some of the problems to be debated in Rio. We followed up this meeting by a conversation with Robert Woodward, Deputy Assistant Under-Secretary for Inter-American Affairs, Deputy Director of the Office of Regional American Affairs, and Horsey, and took this opportunity to discuss procedural aspects of our participation at the Rio meeting. It is our intention to report here on arrangements for Canada's participation and to report in a subsequent letter on United States views concerning the economic problems to be discussed in Rio.

2. Mr. Woodward told us that the confidential announcement of Canada's willingness to participate in the Rio meeting had been welcomed by all members of the General Committee of the Economic and Social Council of the OAS to which it had been reported by the Brazilians. The matter of an invitation being issued to Canada was being thoroughly studied by the General Committee with a view to ironing out procedural difficulties arising out of the absence of constitutional provisions for participation in such meetings of a country having the status of an observer. (Some international organizations enjoy the status of observer already but the problems raised by their participation is understandably of a different nature).

3. There was no doubt, Mr. Woodward said, as to the sympathy with which the countries represented in the General Committee were welcoming Canadian participation. There had been some sensitivity in certain quarters, however, lest an invitation be issued and not accepted. There was a precedent of such a situation and members of the General Committee wished to be sure in advance of Canada's acceptance of the invitation before issuing it. They were satisfied in this respect by Brazilian assurances concerning Canada's intentions and the remaining problem was to agree on a resolution which would provide for an official invitation to Canada and for determining the nature of its participation as an observer. According to the rules of procedure of the OAS, no individual member could extend an invitation to a non-member country. This had to be done in the form of a resolution of the General Committee, at the suggestion of an OAS member.

4. The resolution concerning Canada's participation had been drafted and discussed at meetings of the General Committee. It will come up for approval at the next meeting of the Committee which is to be held next Wednesday. The draft resolution which was shown to us in confidence states that the Brazilians have received from Canada an "inquiry" which "manifested Canada's desire to participate" in the Rio meeting. It provides also for the status of Canada as an observer. It will be noted that once approved by the General Committee this resolution will become part of the official record of the organization. We were given to understand that such resolutions are not normally published. It is possible, however, that the substance of this particular resolution might be disclosed in an OAS press release when an invitation is officially issued to the Canadian Government.

5. We expressed some surprise concerning the wording quoted above and explained that as far as we knew the Brazilians had simply been informed through the State Department of our "willingness to accept an invitation, should one be sent to us". Mr. Woodward in reply to our remark said that it was his understanding that Mr. Pearson had told Mr. Dulles in the course of a conversation that Canada wished to participate. In the State Department's view, therefore, Mr. Raynor's inquiry to Mr. Glazebrook as to Canada's intentions and Mr. Dulles' letter to Mr. Pearson were simply following up the original suggestion made by Mr. Pearson. It was the State Department's impression that we had in fact manifested our desire to participate and they had assumed that the wording of the resolution in this respect represented correctly the situation.³ It was also the State Department's impression that the Brazilians had been approached in Ottawa or in Rio by the Canadian Government and that the subject of an invitation to Canada had been discussed. It was assumed by the State Department that the Brazilians had correctly reported Canada's desire to invited.

6. We realize that you may not be satisfied with the wording of the resolution as quoted above. A review of our files has failed to disclose indications concerning the reported conversations between Mr. Pearson and Mr. Dulles and between Canadian Government officials and Brazilian officials on this subject. It is difficult therefore, for us to determine whether the present wording of the resolution is, or is not, in line with your desires. In considering whether you would like us to seek a change in the language of the resolution you may wish, however, to bear in mind the following factors:

(a) It would not be possible for the State Department or for us to disclose the fact that we have seen the draft resolution since it was shown to us in confidence.

(b) Mr. Dulles understands, according to Mr. Woodward, that Mr. Pearson expressed to him personally Canada's desire to participate in the Rio meeting.⁴

³ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

This is quite wrong. Mr. Dulles mentioned the matter orally and I said we would certainly consider any invitation if it were ever received. The invitation came from Dulles & also the expression of "desire" that we should participate. L.B. P[earson]

⁴ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

No Dulles' own letter of Aug 24 contradicts this! L.B. P[earson]

(c) The State Department is under the impression that we expressed our views directly to the Brazilians on how we would like to see the matter handled.

(d) Members of the General Committee, while welcoming Canada's participation are sensitive as to the manner in which the invitation should be issued and there is a possibility that they might resent at this stage an indication that Canada does not wish to assume openly the responsibility for being invited to the meeting.

(e) We have not discussed with Mr. Woodward the possibility of having changes made in the resolution but we sensed that the State Department would be somewhat reluctant to suggest changes before the General Committee at this stage. They might, however, if you so desired, raise the subject informally with the Brazilians and suggest to them some alternative wording.

7. In a following teletype we intend to deal with the status of Canada as an observer and to report on United States views as to Canada's possible role in the Rio meeting.

ECONOMIC MEETING OF O.A.S. IN RIO

Following from the Minister, Begins: I was surprised to read some of the remarks attributed to Mr. Dulles and to me. It might be helpful if you had my version of the story:

(a) When I was in Washington in March of this year for the Joint Committee Meeting, Mr. Dulles made a passing reference about Canada's participation in the O.A.S. to which I replied in like vein without commitment. Toward the end of May the State Department took up with you the question of Canada's participation in the Rio Conference as an observer. On August 24, Mr. Dulles wrote to me personally to enquire if the Canadian "Government would be open to an invitation" to attend the Rio Conference. I replied on August 27 that I was looking into the "possibility of Canadian participation therein". After Cabinet consideration of the matter I told Mr. Dulles in New York, towards the end of September that if an invitation was received to attend the Rio Conference as an observer, we would accept it. At no time did I express "Canada's desire" to participate in the Rio Conference, as mentioned in paragraphs 5 and 6 of your telegram under reference.

(b) When a member of the Department discussed this matter privately with the Brazilian Ambassador in Ottawa on September 23, he also indicated clearly that if an invitation was made, the Canadian Government would be prepared to send an observer to the Rio Conference but that Canada was not seeking an invitation. This information was conveyed to the Brazilian Ambassador because of the interest which Brazil has always taken in the matter and the fact that the Conference was to be held in Rio.

2. The interpretation contained in paragraph 5 of your telegram that all this adds up to merely a Canadian "willingness" to accept the invitation, if one were made, corresponds therefore with the facts.

3. In the circumstances, it would, I think, be appropriate for those who have it in their power to extend an invitation to accept the responsibility of making it without putting Canada in the slightly awkward position of a solicitor of favours. Might it not be suggested by the State Department that the Brazilians and the United States should take a slightly different tack? Instead of having a Resolution which notes that an "enquiry" has been received which "manifested Canada's desire to participate", it would be more accurate and better for the Resolution to note that the O.A.S. Members, desirous of extending an invitation to Canada to attend as an observer, have received an assurance from Canada that, if such an invitation were made, Canada would be willing to accept it.

4. This is a matter of some delicacy with the inviting States as well as for the State being invited but I hope that it will be possible to set the record straight. Ends.

ECONOMIC MEETING OF THE OAS IN RIO

We saw Mr. Woodward again this morning after receiving your helpful message setting the records straight as to the manner in which we would like an invitation to be extended to Canada for the Rio meeting. Before we had time to put forward our views on this subject we were informed that, following remarks made by the United States representative on the General Committee, an amendment had been made in the draft resolution eliminating the necessity for the Brazilians to notify officially the OAS of Canada's intentions, and indicating "Canada's interest in the meeting" instead of "its desire to participate."

2. It was suggested by the State Department that the objectionable original wording had probably been introduced in the draft resolution by the Brazilian representative on his own initiative and that there was a possibility that he had gone beyond his instructions from his Foreign Ministry in so doing. In any event he had agreed yesterday, along with all other members of the General Committee, with the new wording expressing simply "Canada's interest in the meeting". We said that we thought there would be no objection on Canada's part to this reference. While we realize that you would have preferred the wording suggested in your teletype EX-1903 of yesterday to this expression of Canadian interest in the meeting, we thought it might not have been altogether appropriate to suggest a new change in the draft resolution which has now been agreed upon by the General Committee. We thought further that if the new wording did not meet with your approval it might be easier to have it corrected at the suggestion of the Brazilians who were responsible in the first place for the previous wording than at the suggestion of the United States representative.

3. We were interested to learn that yesterday when the fourth meeting of the General Committee on the subject of an invitation to Canada was held, as well as during the three previous meetings, the Brazilian representative had been the only one on the Committee to express his concern at the possibility that Canada, once invited, might not accept the invitation. The precedent for an OAS invitation being refused, to which we referred in our message reporting our first conversation with Mr. Woodward, had created a certain "malaise" at the time and was responsible for that sensitivity. We learned today that this precedent is alleged to have taken place after a Peruvian invitation to Canada to attend a conference on travel, which was held in Lima in 1951, was not accepted by Canada and apparently was left unanswered.

4. We informed the State Department that a new approach to the Brazilians was to be made today in Ottawa and that it could be expected that no doubt would be left in their mind as to Canada's willingness to accept the OAS invitation. The resolution of the General Committee will be submitted tomorrow to the Council of the OAS requesting an authorization for the Economic and Social Council to extend an official invitation to Canada. According to the State Department there is no doubt that the requested authorization will be granted.⁵

The OAS formally invited Canada to observe its Rio meeting on October 22, 1954. Canada accepted the invitation and nominated S.D. Pierce, Ambassador in Brazil, as its observer. He was accompanied by Peter Towe from American Division.

ECONOMIC MEETING OF THE ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES IN RIO

This morning at the State Department we had a conversation about the Rio meeting with Corbett, Director of the Office of Financial and Development Policy, who accompanied Holland on his recent tour of Latin American capitals. Corbett was frank in saying that the State Department had taken the initiative in suggesting that Canada be present at the Rio meeting because they hoped we would have an exemplary effect. They had lost patience with the inconsistency in the attitude of most Latin American countries towards foreign capital and wished to have an exhibit of what could be done by a country that took practical steps to encourage foreign investment. As an illustration of the perversity of Latin American attitudes, Corbett mentioned that Brazil is currently spending approximately $200 million a year for imported oil, much of it from the United States. Nevertheless, it is believed that there are large oil deposits in Brazil. But foreign companies have not been allowed to engage even in exploratory activities. At the same time, the Brazilian authorities who talked to Holland during his recent visit to Rio were clamouring for greater foreign investment.

2. It would clearly suit the State Department very well if the Canadian observer at the Rio meeting were to be instructed to expatiate on the sound domestic policies in Canada that have attracted United States capital and to suggest, further, the United States investment in Canada has not detracted from our independence. Whether or not we draw attention to ourselves by some such statement we will clearly be on exhibit. Even if we remain mum, we will be rather like the stuffed effigy of Jeremy Bentham that may be seen in a glass case in London; and we may expect that a pointer will now and again travel in our direction when illustrating the purest principles of political economy. The moral that we will be there to enforce is that a country that keeps its own house in order may expect an inflow of foreign capital and that this need not weaken its sovereign independence even if the capital is primarily directed towards the exploitation of its raw material resources.

3. Corbett made it clear that the United States delegation will have very few sops to give to their Latin American allies. Such little largesse as they will travel with may even be kept under lock and key by the Secretary of the Treasury. One of the uncertainties of the meeting, Corbett indicated, is how Mr. Humphrey will behave. Considerable time and trouble have been taken in Washington to manufacture a few nick-nacks that it is hoped may go some distance towards satisfying the Latin Americans. But Mr. Humphrey, as you know, is an uncompromising believer in the virtues of free enterprise and there is some apprehension that he may prevent even these meagre stores from being unpacked.

4. The United States delegation will be able to announce that technical assistance to Latin America is to be increased. But they can hardly expect many hats to be thrown in the air about that. Of more significance is the announcement they will make that the activities of the Export-Import Bank in Latin America are to be "intensified". The United States statement on economic development, according to present plans, will begin by saying the most of the money needed for economic development in South America must inevitably come from private savings, either domestic or foreign. There are, however, projects which cannot be privately financed. In so far as these require foreign capital, recourse should first be to the International Bank. Some projects, however, would not be suitable for financing by the International Bank; and the Export-Import Bank stands ready to provide capital in all such cases. Three conditions, however, must be met:

- (a) The project must be economically sound;
- (b) Other sources of capital must be unavailable; and
- (c) There must be a good prospect that the loan can be serviced and ultimately repaid.

5. The significance of the statement that will be made by the United States delegation at Rio about the policy of the Export-Import Bank obviously depends on the spirit in which this policy is administered. Corbett told us that the decision to intensify the activities of the Export-Import Bank in Latin America had been taken within the National Advisory Council and indicated that the intent of the new policy was to provide a more liberal flow of capital to South America. If, however, the conditions cited in the paragraph above were interpreted in a niggardly way, there would be little, if any, increase in the bank's activities in Latin America. Since Mr. Humphrey has been personally inclined to take a restrictive view of the bank's operations, there is some fear in the States Department that his remarks at Rio may be such as to suggest that the new policy for the Export-Import Bank is not likely to result in many new loans. If that fear materializes, Latin American countries may be excused, Corbett said, for charging the United States with a breach of faith since Holland had been authorized to tell the ten presidents with whom he spoke on his tour they could expect more money from the Export-Import Bank.

6. Should any cloud be cast on this announcement, the United States delegation will be virtually empty-handed at the conference, since it has been decided that the requests that may be expected from Latin American countries for

- (a) larger grant aid for economic development,
- (b) some international scheme to stabilize commodity prices, and
- (c) a firm United States undertaking to provide a fixed quantity of loan assistance over the next few years, must be resisted.

7. In discussing the requests that may be expected for larger grant assistance, Corbett reported that many Latin American officials with whom he had talked during his recent tour with Holland had admitted there were not many fully worked out plans for economic development in Latin America that could absorb United States aid. However, they had argued that if the United States were to increase its grant assistance, this would provide a challenge which would certainly meet with an enthusiastic and workmanlike response in South America. Corbett's only comment on that thesis was that it would not be very easy to sell to Congress. There would also be some talk at Rio, he expected, to the effect that United States aid to Latin America was disproportionately small when compared with the aid extent to South and South-East Asia. He thought that if that charge were made, the United States delegation should meet it head-on by replying that most Latin American countries were intrinsically far richer than the countries in South and South-East Asia and that far more private capital was even now being invested in Latin America.

8. In the discussions that will take place at Rio on commodity questions, Corbett said that the United States delegation would express some sympathy with the problems of Latin American countries which depend for their earnings of foreign exchange on only one or two commodities. However, United States spokesmen would quickly take refuge in the rather anodyne remarks on raw materials policy made by the President Eisenhower in his message to Congress on foreign economic policy of the 30th of March; and more informally, they would add that, as a general rule, they did not see how international schemes for stabilizing commodity prices could be successfully administered. Even within the borders of a single country, the United States had run into great difficulty in trying to stabilize farm prices. The difficulties on an international scale would be immensely greater.

9. Corbett admitted that there was some sense in the request for a firm undertaking by the United States to supply capital at a fixed rate for a number of years. But he said that he and others in the United States government had difficulty in understanding why such importance should be attached to making this variable, in a very large and complicated problem, constant. Even if the amount of inter-governmental lending by the United States were increased substantially, the capital so provided would be a small proportion of all the capital, both private and public, being invested in the economic development of Latin America. In any event, of course, it would be quite impossible, because of the division of power within the United States Government, to undertake to provide a fixed amount of inter-governmental capital over a period of years.

10. All in all, it would seem that our United States friends may be in for a rather rough time. Presumably at our first appearance at an OAS meeting it would be impolitic for us to give them much comfort by stressing the importance of sound internal measures. Conversely it would probably be inappropriate for us to join very vigorously in any attack on United States commercial policy. Our proper role would seem to be to sit quietly in a corner and, without pulling out any plums, to have the air of saying, "what a good boy am I".

RIO ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

Your telegrams have been most helpful in assessing what is likely to come up at the Rio meeting. As Canada will be attending the Conference as an observer, there would be little point in sending someone to Washington to discuss in detail the United States position. There will doubtless be occasion in Rio to have private talks of this nature.

2. It is not intended, of course, that the Observer State shall "expatiate on the sound domestic Canadian policies that have attracted United States Capital". All in all, it will be better for the Canadian representatives to sit quietly and observe. In private conversations with Latin-American representatives and where it can be done discreetly, the way in which things are being done in various Canadian fields of economic activity could be explained — remembering always that Canada is an observer only.

3. The attitude which the U.S. delegation may take regarding us is somewhat disturbing. You might find a suitable occasion to let it be known at any appropriate level in the State Department that we intend to stick closely to our modest observer's role at the deliberations of the Conference and hope, accordingly, that our friends will not focus the spotlight on us.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, November 10, 1954

Dear Mr. Pierce,

When the Canadian Government agreed to accept an invitation to attend as an observer the Conference of Economic and Finance Ministers to be held in Rio, it did so without prejudice to Canada's future attitude toward the Organization of American States as a whole. It was largely because of Canada's marked interest in the economic future of Latin America that it was thought useful for us to attend the Conference as an observer in order better to understand some of the main issues in the field of economics, finance and trade affecting Inter-American relations.

There is little doubt, however, that Canada's attendance as an observer at Rio will be considered as a politically significant event by the United States and the Latin-American countries. They are likely to interpret this observership as concrete evidence that, in the not too distant future, Canada will become a full member of the Organization of American States. It is not the wish of the Canadian Government to give currency to this thought at the present time. Our "observership" at this special economic conference should therefore be carried out in such a way as to give to Latin American countries and to the United States the minimum hope that our policy regarding fuller membership in the Organization of American States has in any respects altered. With this in mind, you should therefore do your best to keep out of the limelight and to discourage any movement for a closer association of Canada with the Inter-American system. This will not be easy if, at the same time, you are not to give offense to the representatives of Latin-American States. So as to bring you up to date on the position hitherto taken by Canada in the Inter-American system, you will find in the attached brief which has been prepared for you a memorandum on this subject prepared in the Department.⁶

I do not expect that you will find it necessary to take a position at the Conference with respect to the agenda items which will be discussed. It would be useful, however, for you to know the general Canadian policy on the subjects under consideration. Such information may be found in the attached brief. This brief ought to be of value to you in any private conversations you may have with the representatives attending the Conference.

As you know, Mr. P.M. Towe of the Department, is being sent to help you. He is aware of the latest thinking in Ottawa in the political and economic fields as they relate to this Conference. Needless to say that I wish you every success in this mission. I will be interested to read your report on not only the economic, finance and trade aspects of the Conference but also on the political aspects of Canada's presence as an observer.

Yours sincerely,
L.B. PEARSON

RIO ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

There is now an obvious gap between the role designed for Canada at Rio by the OAS and your plan for the delegation, and an even wider gap between the United States and Canadian ideas of the Canadian role. We appreciate the reasons for your position and I have only two minor modifications to your plan to suggest for your consideration. We fully realize that Canada cannot be trotted out at Rio as a kind of exhibit such as the State Department had intended. We would, however, be glad if we could move a few inches towards their concept of an active Canadian role, since we are naturally reluctant to dampen down the new helpfulness and frankness which now exists in the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs.

2. The more important consideration, however, we suggest, is that the Latin American members of OAS who were, as you know, sensitive about extending an invitation which might be refused should feel that we had turned down too coldly and too completely the special category misleadingly called "observer" which they had designed for us as the only American state, not a member of OAS, present at Rio. Such an impression, we feel, would be unhelpful in the general context of Canadian relations with Latin America.

3. Will you consider allowing us to explain to the State Department that while Canadian delegation will be present in Rio for the most part in the position of a true observer, that this does not preclude the possibility of contributing information when requested, or even expressing interest, if occasions for such action arose?

4. We also suggest that you might re-consider your decision not to send Towe here for pre-conference discussions. While we realize that this is not as convenient, we do feel that the offer of the State Department to place all its information before us was, whatever the motives, generous and a helpful precedent for future dealings with the bureau in question. If Towe could come here for a day and return to Ottawa, it would allow for discussions there of the information he had gathered. The less good alternative would be to have him come to Washington and from here direct to Rio.

RIO ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

Clearly our position at the Rio meeting is not going to be an easy one.

2. On the one hand we are naturally not anxious to be manoeuvred into the position of having to take sides in the controversies which may develop between the United States and Latin American delegations. Neither would we be willing to subscribe to a regional approach to some of the subjects on the agenda in the unlikely event that the United States and the Latin American countries might agree on such an approach. Moreover we would not wish our conduct in Rio to give rise to a possibly misleading impression concerning the prospects for future Canadian participation in the OAS. In short, we think that we should not play an active or vocal role in the Conference.

3. On the other hand we would not want to seem unappreciative of the action of the members of OAS in inviting us to be present at this particular economic conference. We are also conscious of the fact (as no doubt the United States is) that this meeting may be a critical one in terms of future relations between the U.S. and Latin America. Only the Soviet Bloc (and possibly Argentina) would welcome, or profit by, any deterioration in relations resulting from deep differences over economic issues at this meeting. For reasons such as these we are concerned that our part in the conference should not be unhelpful.

4. On balance our conclusion is that it would be wise for our observer to be relatively passive, although we would not expect him to refrain from providing information which might be relevant to the discussions and which he might consider to be useful. The brief which is being sent to Mr. Pierce would seem to contain most of the information which it would be appropriate for him to supply. We are also letting him have our comments on the various items on the agenda for his information and judicious use.

5. We should be grateful if you would explain the situation again to the State Department and thank them for their cooperation. We would hope that they would understand our reasons for taking this position and would agree that such an attitude on our part is likely to be in the best interests of all concerned.

6. With reference to the last paragraph, Towe has already left for Rio and will, therefore, not be able to visit Washington prior to the Conference. He will consult members of U.S. delegation there.

DESPATCH 694

Rio de Janeiro, December 2, 1954

FOURTH EXTRAORDINARY SESSION OF MINISTERS OF FINANCE OR ECONOMY OF THE ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES, QUITANDINHA, BRAZIL,
NOVEMBER 22ND TO DECEMBER 2ND, 1954⁷

This was the first meeting of the Finance Ministers of all the members of the Organization of American States and it was specially convened to deal with economic questions consideration of which was postponed from the 10th Congress of American States at Caracas at the request of the United States. Nonetheless, it turned out to be a routine, public, heavily-documented meeting with none of the intimacy of a meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers; and little of its flavour except for the communiqué issued at the close of the conference.

2. The agenda was burdened with draft resolutions for the most part expressing fixed positions adopted in advance by the Latin-Americans. Their main goals were high and stable prices for their raw material exports and the establishment of a Latin-American lending institution to increase the flow of capital from the United States. The United States, too, started from a fixed position, at the opposite pole. It was enunciated by Holland, Assistance Secretary of State, in his speech to the Pan-American Society of the United States in New York on October 27th⁸ and reiterated by Humphrey, Secretary of the Treasury, in his opening address at this meeting. It rejected inter-American solutions; asserted the adequacy of existing lending institutions, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the Export-Import Bank, and the projected International Finance Corporation; and sought to maintain the sanctity of existing international obligations such as those to the GATT; and as its foundations, there was an insistence on freedom of private enterprise. With its refusal to accept the Latins' proposals, the United States announced a more liberal lending policy and outlined the further liberalization of U.S. trade and commercial policy which President Eisenhower intended to ask from Congress.

3. Thus the conference opened with a serious gap between entrenched positions. As was expected the Latin nations presented their proposals and as was expected the United States rejected them. The abruptness of the rejection was not, however, expected and at one stage in the conference it looked as if the Latin-Americans would not only be disappointed, as they had expected, but that they would be offended as well, for the U.S. delegates were for a time bluntly over-emphasizing the negative aspects of the U.S. policy. For the first time in O.A.S. meetings they did not strive to amend every resolution so they could vote for it. They frequently abstained, sometimes in the face of 20 favourable votes. For a time they were registering their abstentions too emphatically. However the U.S. delegates changed their attitude in mid-conference and cooperated as best they could within the limits imposed on them by the Humphrey doctrine, both in meetings and outside. In bilateral talks they did much to make the others appreciate the extent and the practical value of the aid which was available to them within these limits; and of the goodwill of the U.S. people and government toward Latin America.

4. At the close, the U.S. delegates were pleased with the results. They felt they had made both their position and their goodwill clear to the others and had improved relations while doing so. I think a better understanding was reached: I think relations at the best remained about as they were. State Department officials thought it had been extremely beneficial to have Humphrey and others unfamiliar with Latin America see at first hand the nature of the problem. They think they will henceforth be more sympathetic to the area.

5. The Latin members most closely associated with the major concrete proposals were disappointed because the United States would have none of it. Many others, though, were satisfied. In the first place, it turned out better than they expected. They took comfort from the assurances of increased U.S. support; from the advances made toward reducing double taxation in the United States; with the promise of some U.S. cooperation in some of the studies, notably coffee and bananas. They were heartened particularly by what they considered were indications that the Holland-Humphrey line could be breached. Those indications included the change in U.S. attitude mid-way through the Conference, which I mentioned above, even though that was a change of manner not of matter; and the unofficial speech by Congressman Fulton calling for more aid to Latin America.

6. I think the conference will in retrospect be regarded as important. The reality of the U.S. position toward Latin America had never been made as clear and this may lead the Latin Americans to adopt a more practical approach to the solution of their problems. Even those who disliked the most the medicine they had to swallow may come to acknowledge its salutary effect. For nations who are not members of the Organization the Conference was significant in that the United States firmly rejected narrow inter-American solutions in favour of a generalized multilateral approach emphasizing the importance of free initiative.

7. It was not hard to follow your instructions to keep out of the limelight and to give the Latin American countries the minimum hope of our joining the O.A.S. There were nine other non-American countries present. They were treated as invited representatives. The distinction made between them and us was that only we were seated at the council table and had a right to speak. It was necessary to use this latter privilege only once, to reply to a welcome from the President of the Session. I attach a copy of what little I said.† Our reception was warm but not effusive and we were at no time embarrassed. The Secretary of the Organization of American States, Dr. Dávila, said to me privately he looked forward to full Canadian membership. Senior Brazilian officials expressed their satisfaction at our presence. The United States representatives showed clearly we were most welcome but did not mention us in the debates, perhaps thanks to your intercession at Washington before the conference opened. The Chief Director of the Economic Commission for Latin America, Dr. Paul Prebisch, seemed to expect we might be used as an example and forestalled it by pointing out in his speech that the case of Canada was not similar to that of other Latin American States because we already were industrialized and developed.

8. Canadian interests were not directly involved. At most, some of the resolutions might lead to the establishment of study groups which might recommend courses of action which might lead Latin American nations to seek the waiver of some of their existing international obligations; and here, the effect, if any, would not be felt for a long time. When subjects of interest to Canada were discussed, the United States said for the most part what we thought needed to be said; our weight would have added little.

9. I think we would have gained nothing from full membership. In most cases we would have agreed with the United States. We could have helped the United States a little and perhaps raised the level of the debates a shade. But, all in all, I saw nothing in it for us.

10. The Ministers announced in their communiqué that they would meet again in Buenos Aires in 1956.

11. Separate notes on various subjects will follow.†
